

Edited and with an Introduction by

KATHLEEN COSTELLO-SULLIVAN

armilla

BY JOSEPH

SHERIDAN LE FANU

A Critical Edition

CARMILLA
BY JOSEPH SHERIDAN LE FANU

Irish Studies
James MacKillop, Series Editor

Other titles in the Irish series

Collaborative Dubliners: Joyce in Dialogue

Vicki Mahaffey, ed.

Gender and Medicine in Ireland, 1700–1950

Margaret Preston and Margaret Ó hÓgartaigh, eds.

Grand Opportunity: The Gaelic Revival and Irish Society, 1893–1910

Timothy G. McMahon

Ireland in Focus: Film, Photography, and Popular Culture

Eóin Flannery and Michael Griffin, eds.

The Irish Bridget: Irish Immigrant Women in Domestic Service in America, 1840–1930

Margaret Lynch-Brennan

Irish Theater in America: Essays on Irish Theatrical Diaspora

John P. Harrington, ed.

Joyce, Imperialism, and Postcolonialism

Leonard Orr, ed.

Making Ireland Irish: Tourism and National Identity since the Irish Civil War

Eric G. E. Zuelow

Memory Ireland, Volume 1: History and Modernity, and Volume 2:

Diaspora and Memory Practices

Oona Frawley, ed.

The Midnight Court / Cúirt an Mheán Oíche

Brian Merriman; David Marcus, trans.; Brian Ó Conchubhair, ed.

CARMILLA
BY
JOSEPH SHERIDAN LE FANU

A CRITICAL EDITION

EDITED AND WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY
KATHLEEN COSTELLO-SULLIVAN

SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Copyright © 2013 by Syracuse University Press
Syracuse, New York 13244-5290

All Rights Reserved

First Edition 2013

13 14 15 16 17 18      6 5 4 3 2 1

Illustrations courtesy of the Special Collections/Research Center, Syracuse University Library.

∞ The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of the American National Standard for Information Sciences—Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials, ANSI Z39.48-1992.

For a listing of books published and distributed by Syracuse University Press, visit our website at SyracuseUniversityPress.syr.edu.

ISBN: 978-0-8156-3311-2

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Le Fanu, Joseph Sheridan, 1814–1873.

Carmilla / by Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu, a critical edition edited and with an introduction by Kathleen Costello-Sullivan. — First edition.

pages cm. — (Irish Studies)

Includes bibliographical references.

ISBN 978-0-8156-3311-2 (pbk. : alk. paper) 1. Vampires—Fiction. 2. Styria (Austria)—Fiction. 3. Horror fiction. I. Costello-Sullivan, Kathleen. II. Title.

PR4879.L7C3 2013

823'.8—dc23

2013006085

Manufactured in the United States of America

For Thomas and Matthew

Contents

List of Illustrations     ix

Acknowledgments     xi

Notes on the Text     xiii

Introduction: Meet Carmilla

KATHLEEN COSTELLO-SULLIVAN     xvii

PART ONE

Carmilla

JOSEPH SHERIDAN LE FANU     3

PART TWO

An Irish Carmilla?

JARLATH KILLEEN     99

Carmilla and the Politics of Indistinguishability

RENÉE FOX     110

A “Ghastly Fancy”: The Picturesque and the Gothic in Carmilla as a Vampire Aesthetic

LISABETH C. BUCHELT     122

On Celluloid Carmillas

NANCY M. WEST     138

Timeline	151
Works Cited and Additional Materials	155
Biographical Notes	165

Introduction

Meet Carmilla

KATHLEEN COSTELLO-SULLIVAN

First serialized in the journal The Dark Blue and published shortly thereafter in the short story collection In a Glass Darkly, Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu's 1872 vampire tale is in many ways the overlooked older sister of Bram Stoker's later and more acclaimed work Dracula.<sup>1</sup> Despite its acknowledged influence on the later text and its recognition as "the first really successful vampire story," Carmilla is sometimes discounted as a minor work (Geary 1999, 19). This is because Le Fanu himself is often dismissed as a comparatively minor writer or pigeon-holed as a representative of the sensational/gothic subgenres, or because Stoker's later text purportedly better exemplifies what one typically seeks in a vampire tale.<sup>2</sup>

Yet Carmilla has nonetheless remained on the critical radar, repeatedly drawing attention and analysis. Of course, the story's very

1. For a reading that situates Dracula as a direct response to Carmilla, see Signorotti 1996. For another nod to the earlier tale's influence on Stoker, see Miller 2006, esp. 7–8, 13.

2. Benson Saler and Charles A. Ziegler argue that Dracula is "more prototypical than Carmilla because its narrative features conform fully to the general structure of widely encountered monster-slaying stories whereas that is not the case for Carmilla" (2005, 220).

nature as a vampire tale alone generates interest, accounting for its frequent inclusion as an early example of the form in British fiction,<sup>3</sup> but Carmilla has proven to have far more to offer than merely its vampiric credentials. The story's potential as a political and/or cultural metaphor, its psychological resonances, its representations of gender and sexuality, and its unusual aesthetic and narrative characteristics, to name only a few areas of interest, repeatedly invite literary criticism, forcing scholars to return to this short, complex work again and again. This introduction traces the major movements of that critical history.

It is, of course, as a vampire tale that Carmilla originally provoked such pointed interest. Beyond its significance purely as a sensational or entertaining figure in literature, the vampire fed a variety of metaphorical hungers in the wider Victorian literary imagination. According to Robert F. Geary, the increasing popularity of vampires (and of other supernatural creatures and events) from the mid-nineteenth century on can be read as signaling Victorian uncertainty in the face of a more scientific, less religious, and therefore less mysterious world:

The specter of a chilling, purposeless materialism confronted many whose view of humanity and the world no longer was dictated by Christian doctrines. . . . [I]n this climate ghostly supernatural entities were for many no longer embarrassing reminders of dangerous superstitions; instead, the specters and weird events, now thoroughly detached from a Christian context, served as a refuge, if only a clandestine one, from the dominant materialistic scientism. (Geary 1999, 22)

Vampires' supernatural characteristics offered an oasis of mystery in a sea of increasing enlightenment and yet, uncannily, also a corresponding sense of disillusionment. In this respect, the traditional combination of a vampire's simultaneous magnetism and repulsiveness

3. For example, Carmilla was included in a New Riverside edition entitled Three Vampire Tales, where it was referenced as one of "three classic representations of the vampire" (Williams 2003, back cover).

arguably parallels the mixed feelings experienced by its Victorian contemporaries, who, even while reveling in their accomplishments and scientific breakthroughs, mourned the perceived loss of mystery and wonder that science and materialism were thought to bring. The aggressive foregrounding in Carmilla of the sciences—represented, for example, through Laura’s father and references to contemporary figures such as natural scientist Georges-Louis Leclerc, Comte de Buffon—alongside the supernatural certainly suggests an engagement with such tensions in the novel.<sup>4</sup>

A similarly characteristic usage of the vampire by Victorians often investigated in Carmilla is the engagement with contemporary new discoveries in psychology and the social sciences. Hung-Jung Lee has argued that “Carmilla . . . expresses an increasing fear toward the end of the [nineteenth] century that . . . classifications [differentiating “men from women, ‘civilized’ Europeans from ‘primitive’ natives, moral individuals from corrupt ones”] could easily break down, or turn out to be ineffectual” and that the text thus ultimately frets over “the limits of the self and how desire threatens and transforms those limits” (2006, 23).<sup>5</sup> William Veeder’s earlier, authoritative reading situates Carmilla as “ultimately a tale of repression,” exposing contemporary concern that “orthodox attitudes toward sexual purity had caused a dangerous split between conscious and unconscious” (1980, 198).<sup>6</sup> Critical readings of Carmilla thus often foreground the psychological complexity of the text’s engagement with the unconscious

4. Sally Harris (2003) examines Le Fanu’s engagement with the tension between the spiritual and material worlds in terms of his Irish background. For a reading of Carmilla in light of “Victorian disease theories” and “Anglo-Irish ethnicity,” see Willis 2008.

5. For a reading of “Le Fanu’s oeuvre” as “moving the gothic mode away from clanking chains and clichéd ghosts toward a subjectivity of the self” owing to his debt to the works of Emanuel Swedenborg, see Zuber 2006, 75.

6. Michael Davis offers a related reading of Carmilla as “a failure of ‘translation’; a traumatising failure to decode the enigmatic signifiers received from and indeed implanted by the other” (2004, 224).

and subjectivity.<sup>7</sup> Carmilla therefore not only reflects contemporary scientific advances in the Victorian era but also stands as both an engagement with and a representation of the concerns hailing from such discoveries.

Given vampires' ability to inspire both curiosity and fear, it is not surprising that they also came to be employed as a metaphor for a host of perceived late Victorian social threats and ills—first among which was concern with female sexuality and power. As Tamar Heller convincingly argues, many of the characteristics attributed to vampires reflect contemporary representations of and insecurities about women and their suspected sexual appetites, as is captured in this novella: “the thematics of appetite in ‘Carmilla’—which [can be linked] to medical discourses about the related female maladies of hysteria, anorexia, and chlorosis—encode this fear of the devouring, sexually voracious woman lurking beneath the docile surface of the devoured woman, her apparent victim” (1996, 79).<sup>8</sup> As Elizabeth Signorotti argues, whereas Stoker's later text Dracula can be said to contain the threat of the contemporary “New Woman,” effectively impaling her on the stake of reinstituted masculine power and medical authority, Le Fanu's text instead empowers women by “depict[ing] a society where men increasingly become relegated to powerless positions while women assume aggressive roles” (1996, 620–24, 607, 611).<sup>9</sup> Carmilla has also been read as representing “a fear of the Other's more vital sexuality overtaking the English colonizers,” which reflects “a conflation of the female and the racial Other” (Brock 2009, 120, 131). Whether read as an endorsement, a rebuttal, or an anxious exploration of female power,

7. For readings of Carmilla in terms of Jungian archetypes and Kleinian psychoanalytic theory, see Andriano 1990 and Michelis 2003, respectively.

8. Carol Senf offers another consideration of what vampires and women purportedly have in common, if in a generally less convincing essay (1987, esp. 29).

9. For a related reading of Carmilla as employing the tradition of masquerade to produce “subversive representations of female authority and active sexual desire,” see Thomas 1999, 47.

there is little doubt that Carmilla presents an unusual and provocative engagement with Victorian domestic and gendered roles.<sup>10</sup>

That the crux of Le Fanu's investigation into female power centers around a lesbian interaction obviously also sets Carmilla outside the parameters of traditional Victorian representation, reinforcing its interest as a late-nineteenth-century text.<sup>11</sup> Although some dismiss the homosexual nature of Laura and Carmilla's attraction in favor of a mother/daughter trope, most scholars recognize the undeniable sexual overtones of their interactions. As such, most would agree with Signorotti that Carmilla "is decidedly no mother," as "[t]he homoerotic overtones of the . . . attack on Laura's breast eclipse the initial mother/child dynamic and establish the nature of the two women's ensuing relationship" (1996, 612).<sup>12</sup> In its reflections of contemporary Victorian concerns and mores as well as its engagement with issues of gender relations and sexuality, Carmilla clearly offers a rich and wide array of opportunities for study and interest.

We thus turn now to why this text is so well suited for inclusion in this series on Irish literature. As a Protestant Irish, Dublin-born author, J. Sheridan Le Fanu would have been privy to all the political and cultural concerns of late-nineteenth-century Ireland; his work was also in conversation with the concerns and aesthetics of the wider British literary milieu with which Victorian Ireland was in close

10. Nancy Welter offers a reading of Carmilla as reinstating rather than undermining masculine authority (2006, esp. 143–47).

11. For an interesting reading of the role of "transgressive feminine sexuality" as connected to "the language of feminine intellectual discourse," see Major 2007, 151.

12. Examples of readings that emphasize the maternal over the homosexual include Senf 1987, 30; Andriano 1990; and Michelis 2003. For a reading that downplays the homosexual valences in favor of an emphasis on "the limits of the self," see Lee 2006, 23–24. For a different reading of Carmilla in terms of "the sexual sacrifice of children" and "the Anglo-Irish child's ambivalent national/cultural identification," see Backus 1999, 6, 127, and in general 127–34. For a reading of Carmilla in terms of same-sex desire through the vehicle of naming, see Leal 2007.

conversation, such as the fin de siècle and postindustrial anxieties noted earlier.<sup>13</sup> Recognition of the contemporary context of Le Fanu's Carmilla invariably invites readings that position the text's setting and events as a metaphor for other times and places. Matthew Gibson (2006, 2007), for example, has done excellent research into reading Carmilla and its inspirations as connected directly to contemporary eastern European politics and historical figures.<sup>14</sup>

Although such political parallels are entirely plausible and even intriguing, there is little doubt that Le Fanu's Irish background also plays an influential role in the crafting of the novella. Scholars have sought to identify the Irish connection in differing ways. In Le Fanu's engagement with the spiritual, Sally Harris sees an effort to "[draw] upon his experiences with Irish folklore and Catholicism to create characters who believe that the spiritual world and material world are intimately connected" (2003, 10). Most convincing, however, are those readings that concentrate on the role of contemporary Irish politics and their impact on Le Fanu's Anglo-Irish sensibilities. As W. J. McCormack has most persuasively and thoroughly argued, "We can see through Le Fanu's life and work a curiously neglected area—Victorian Ireland," exposing the anxieties of the Protestant middle classes at a time of deepening political tensions (1980, 5; see also the discussions on 5–8 and 76–89).

At the publishing of the first installment of Carmilla in December 1871, a son of a Protestant clergyman who had already experienced

13. Terence Brown considers the parallels between Irish Protestant and British experiences and worldviews in the late Victorian era (1991, esp. 518). For a recent reading of how In a Glass Darkly presents "a symbolical [sic] representation of the troubled Victorian spirit," see Gabusi 2008, 1. W. J. McCormack reads The House by the Church-Yard as a "Victorian Irish reassessment of the eighteenth century" (1991, 883).

14. On another potential inspiration for the work, see McNally 2001. On "the imagining of Eastern Europe in late-nineteenth century [sic] British literature as a projection of anxieties deriving in part from the Irish Question within the Union," see McAteer 2010, 207.

firsthand the consequences of the “tithe war” (Maume 2009) had good reason to feel besieged. William Gladstone had won the 1868 general election on a platform of disestablishing the Church of Ireland; the Home Rule movement had been formed in 1870; and the first Irish Land Act redressing land and tenant rights had passed in August 1871.<sup>15</sup> From an Anglo-Irish perspective, the metaphorical Big House of Anglo-Irish ascendancy had already begun to crumble.<sup>16</sup>

Indeed, in an interesting article published in the little-known journal Cleave, Jamieson Ridenhour argues that Carmilla is “reflective of the political angst then plaguing the Anglo-Irish institution” and that the eponymous character herself serves as a form of aisling figure, “the spierbhean [sic] [who] asks her poet to tell her story so that others will know of her plight” (2002, 57, 61).<sup>17</sup> Each of these readings captures the profound anxieties of Le Fanu’s place and time, which are metaphorically evident in the text.

This edition thus tracks Carmilla in all her complexity. It adheres to the earliest publication of the text and thus presents it as it was 15. For this information and an excellent review of the politics and history of this period more generally, see Jackson 1999, esp. chap. 4.

16. I refer to Le Fanu as “Anglo-Irish” here in the sense used by Marjorie Howes: “Le Fanu’s life and family background typify, in many ways, the predicament of the Anglo-Irish in the mid nineteenth [sic] century. He was born in 1814 into a middle-class professional (rather than landowning) family” (1992, 165).

17. Although this reading is interesting, there are obstacles to it. In order for Carmilla to represent Mother Ireland or the sean bhean bocht, she would need to be an inspiring figure generating loyalty, devotion, and purposeful self-sacrifice. Yet Le Fanu’s employing her here as the “poor old woman” of Irish mythology would need to be read as pointedly ironic: instead of productive sacrifice, General Spielsdorf sets himself up for needless suffering at the hands of a beautiful, rich, and unexpectedly young mother. For Carmilla to represent Ireland, she similarly would need to inspire devotion and portray defiant victimhood, as in the aisling tradition, but Carmilla is no one’s victim and more likely serves as a “return of the repressed” because, heir to the Karnstein lands, she returns to drive the English (read: Anglo-Irish) Other from her rightful place.

originally encountered rather than as one story among others, as it is in the collection In a Glass Darkly—an approach that unearths interesting, original choices later overwritten in subsequent editions, such as the original usage of the term odysic, not idyllic, in the text's first run (see chapter II on this particular revision and "Notes on the Text" for more on editorial choices). Each of the four critical essays collected here, offered by both emerging and well-known scholars in their fields, represents a new yet accessible reading of this important short work while engaging with different facets of the dominant literary critical trends concerning Carmilla. Each essay frames prior discussions of extant debates and opens the door to new interpretive directions for students and advanced scholars alike.

The first two articles in this collection, taken in tandem, engage the questions of Carmilla's sexuality and Irishness, and they model how scholars can use the same material to produce differing conclusions on a text. Irish gothic expert Jarlath Killeen's article "An Irish Carmilla?" engages directly with the much scrutinized question of the novella's (Anglo-)Irish contexts and credentials. Noting that "Ireland is never mentioned" in Le Fanu's text, Killeen takes its sexual resonances as a given and instead focuses on the historical and biographical contexts that invite Anglo-Irish readings of Carmilla. He explores how Carmilla captures dominant metaphorical resonances of its day, as in its employ of vocabulary customarily applied to Irish Famine victims. He argues, however, that readings of the text's Anglo-Irishness are complicated by the indistinct cultural placement of the Anglo-Irish as well as by the inherent ambiguity of the gothic genre, and he provocatively proposes that the text employs images "suggestive of dispossessed Gaelic aristocrats." Killeen thus presents compelling reasons to read Carmilla as Irish, but he recognizes the indeterminacy of that identification and the possibility that such a classification, like Anglo-Irishness itself, remains ambivalent.

Renee Fox's reading, too, examines the role of Irish identity in Carmilla and recognizes the difficulty in forging "a textual distinction between two class factions (Anglo-Irish and Catholic)" in the novella. Whereas Killeen considers the lesbian element of the text to be accepted in most readings and identifies the Irish reading as potentially ambiguous, Fox suggests that the role of female sexuality in the novella is impossible to separate from its political contexts and, indeed, that the very reading of lesbianism is itself subject to scrutiny because “Carmilla’s . . . interest in women does not definitively mark her as perverse, unnatural, or different” in a nineteenth-century context. Instead, Fox argues that the two women’s intimacy signals a productive “indistinguishability between races or classes” in Le Fanu’s text, thereby creating “a space” where the embattled Anglo-Irish might establish narrative and cultural survival.

If Carmilla draws on its Irish contexts as well as on its socio-historical ones, contributor Lisabeth Buchelt counters the traditional critical privileging of the gothic in readings of Carmilla by exploring the resonance and usage of the visual and literary “aesthetics of . . . medievalism” in the novella. Drawing on Edmund Burke’s differentiation of the beautiful and the sublime and on William Gilpin’s addition of the picturesque, Buchelt highlights the novella’s engagement with such aesthetic categories in its representation of the eponymous vampire. By examining narrative instances where the exterior, picturesque landscape intrudes upon the façade of Carmilla’s exterior beauty, Buchelt convincingly argues that the medieval picturesque exposes the lurking monstrosity underneath Carmilla’s attractive exterior. In this respect, she importantly complicates the standard gothic reading of the novel, asserting that “Le Fanu . . . arguably spends more time employing the visual aesthetics of the sublime, beautiful, and picturesque than he does what might be thought of as more classical markers of the literary gothic.”

The last contribution to this collection, by Victorian and film scholar Nancy M. West, considers the ways that Carmilla, like its namesake vampire, shifts form in various film adaptations. Surveying the history of these adaptations, West provides a helpful illustration of what it means to “adapt” a text. In a new and compelling reading, she also exposes filmmakers’ unusual willingness to take liberties with the original, concluding that Carmilla provides “a wonderfully unfettered model for translating page to screen.”

More than “just” a vampire tale, this compelling novella has the capacity to extend its hypnotic sway not only across various areas of interest—gender, sexuality, politics, and culture—but also across sub-genres, styles, and media: gothic, medieval aesthetic, literary, filmic. I trust that this edition and the contributed articles will touch their readers with the same irresistible draw and enthusiasm that has led generations to follow Le Fanu’s provocative tale in years past and undoubtedly, like its namesake revenant, for years to come.

Carmilla

JOSEPH SHERIDAN LE FANU

Prologue

Upon a paper attached to the Narrative which follows, Doctor Hesselius has written a rather elaborate note, which he accompanies with a reference to his Essay on the strange subject which the MS. illuminates.

This mysterious subject, he treats, in that Essay, with his usual learning and acumen, and with remarkable directness and condensation. It will form but one volume of the series of that extraordinary man's collected papers.

As I publish the case, in these volumes, simply to interest the "laity," I shall forestal the intelligent lady, who relates it, in nothing; and, after due consideration, I have determined, therefore, to abstain from presenting any précis of the learned Doctor's reasoning, or extract from his statement on a subject which he describes as "involving, not improbably, some of the profoundest arcane of our dual existence, and its intermediates."

I was anxious, on discovering this paper, to re-open the correspondence commenced by Doctor Hesselius, so many years before, with a person so clever and careful as his informant seems to have been. Much to my regret, however, I found that she had died in the interval.

She, probably, could have added little to the Narrative which she communicates in the following pages, with, so far as I can pronounce, such a conscientious particularity.

I

An Early Fright

In Styria,<sup>1</sup> we, though by no means magnificent people, inhabit a castle, or schloss.<sup>2</sup> A small income, in that part of the world, goes a great way. Eight or nine hundred a year does wonders. Scantly enough ours would have answered among wealthy people at home. My father is English, and I bear an English name, although I never saw England. But here, in this lonely and primitive place, where everything is so marvellously cheap, I really don't see how ever so much more money would at all materially add to our comforts, or even luxuries.

My father was in the Austrian service, and retired upon a pension and his patrimony, and purchased this feudal residence, and the small estate on which it stands, a bargain.

Nothing can be more picturesque or solitary. It stands on a slight eminence in a forest. The road, very old and narrow, passes in front of its drawbridge, never raised in my time, and its moat, stocked with perch, and sailed over by many swans, and floating on its surface white fleets of water-lilies.

1. This location invites reference to the portion of the former Duchy of Styria that is currently located in Slovenia and hearkens to the central placement of vampires in the eastern European tradition. However, the German-language references to Styria and to the more specific "Upper Styria" privilege the German-speaking area that today comprises part of Austria. For an interesting reading of the potential meanings of this location, see Gibson 2006 and 2007.

2. German word for "castle."

Over all this the schloss shows its many-windowed front; its towers, and its Gothic chapel.<sup>3</sup>

The forest opens in an irregular and very picturesque glade before its gate, and at the right a steep Gothic bridge carries the road over a stream that winds in deep shadow through the wood.

I have said that this is a very lonely place. Judge whether I say truth. Looking from the hall door towards the road, the forest in which our castle stands extends fifteen miles to the right, and twelve to the left. The nearest inhabited village is about seven of your English miles to the left. The nearest inhabited schloss of any historic associations, is that of old General Spielsdorf, nearly twenty miles away to the right.

I have said “the nearest inhabited village,” because there is, only three miles westward, that is to say in the direction of General Spielsdorf’s schloss, a ruined village, with its quaint little church, now roofless, in the aisle of which are the mouldering tombs of the proud family of Karnstein, now extinct, who once owned the equally desolate chateau which, in the thick of the forest, overlooks the silent ruins of the town.

Respecting the cause of the desertion of this striking and melancholy spot, there is a legend which I shall relate to you another time.

I must tell you now, how very small is the party who constitute the inhabitants of our castle. I don’t include servants, or those dependents who occupy rooms in the buildings attached to the schloss. Listen, and wonder! My father, who is the kindest man on earth, but growing old; and I, at the date of my story, only nineteen. Eight years have passed since then. I and my father constituted the family at the schloss. My mother, a Styrian lady, died in my infancy, but I had a good-natured governess, who had been with me from, I might almost say, my infancy. I could not remember the time when her fat, benignant face was not a familiar picture in my memory. This was Madame

3. Adhering to a medieval architectural style known for its pointed arches and emphasis on height.

Perrodon, a native of Berne,<sup>4</sup> whose care and good nature in part supplied to me the loss of my mother, whom I do not even remember, so early I lost her. She made a third at our little dinner party. There was a fourth, Mademoiselle De Lafontaine, a lady such as you term, I believe, a “finishing governess.” She spoke French and German, Madame Perrodon French and broken English, to which my father and I added English, which, partly to prevent its becoming a lost language among us, and partly from patriotic motives, we spoke every day. The consequence was a Babel,<sup>5</sup> at which strangers used to laugh, and which I shall make no attempt to reproduce in this narrative. And there were two or three young lady friends besides, pretty nearly of my own age, who were occasional visitors, for longer or shorter terms; and these visits I sometimes returned.

These were our regular social resources; but of course there were chance visits from “neighbours” of only five or six leagues distance. My life was, notwithstanding,<sup>6</sup> rather a solitary one, I can assure you.

My gouvernantes<sup>7</sup> had just so much control over me as you might conjecture such sage persons would have in the case of a rather spoiled girl, whose only parent allowed her pretty nearly her own way in everything.

The first occurrence in my existence, which produced a terrible impression upon my mind, which, in fact, never has been effaced, was one of the very earliest incidents of my life which I can recollect. Some people will think it so trifling that it should not be recorded here. You will see, however, by-and-bye, why I mention it. The nursery, as it was called, though I had it all to myself, was a large room in the upper story of the castle, with a steep oak roof. I can’t have been more than six years old, when one night I awoke, and looking round the room

4. A city in Switzerland with both French- and German-language associations.

5. Reference to the Tower of Babel in the Bible, where God creates multiple languages (there had previously been only one) and thereby “confused the language of the whole earth.” See Genesis 11:1–9.

6. These commas were added in In a Glass Darkly.

7. French word for “governesses.”

from my bed, failed to see the nursery-maid. Neither was my nurse there; and I thought myself alone. I was not frightened, for I was one of those happy children who are studiously kept in ignorance of ghost stories, of fairy tales, and of all such lore as makes us cover up our heads when the door creaks<sup>8</sup> suddenly, or the flicker of an expiring candle makes the shadow of a bed-post dance upon the wall, nearer to our faces. I was vexed and insulted at finding myself, as I conceived, neglected, and I began to whimper, preparatory to a hearty bout of roaring; when to my surprise, I saw a solemn, but very pretty face looking at me from the side of the bed. It was that of a young lady who was kneeling, with her hands under the coverlet. I looked at her with a kind of pleased wonder, and ceased whimpering. She caressed me with her hands, and lay down beside me on the bed, and drew me towards her, smiling;<sup>9</sup> I felt immediately delightfully soothed, and fell asleep again. I was wakened by a sensation as if two needles ran into my breast very deep at the same moment, and I cried loudly. The lady started back, with her eyes fixed on me, and then slipped down upon the floor, and, as I thought, hid herself under the bed.

I was now for the first time frightened, and I yelled with all my might and main. Nurse, nursery-maid, housekeeper, all came running in, and hearing my story, they made light of it, soothing me all they could meanwhile. But, child as I was, I could perceive that their faces were pale with an unwonted look of anxiety, and I saw them look under the bed, and about the room, and peep under tables and pluck open cupboards; and the housekeeper whispered to the nurse: "Lay your hand along that hollow in the bed; someone did lie there, so sure as you did not; the place is still warm."

I remember the nursery-maid petting me, and all three examining my chest, where I told them I felt the puncture, and pronouncing that there was no sign visible that any such thing had happened to me.

8. A misspelling for "creaks," employed in both the serialized text and In a Glass Darkly.

9. Changed from a comma to a semicolon in In a Glass Darkly.

The housekeeper and the two other servants who were in charge of the nursery, remained sitting up all night; and from that time a servant always sat up in the nursery until I was about fourteen.

I was very nervous for a long time after this. A doctor was called in, he was pallid and elderly. How well I remember his long saturnine face, slightly pitted with small pox, and his chestnut wig. For a good while, every second day, he came and gave me medicine, which of course I hated.

The morning after I saw this apparition I was in a state of terror, and could not bear to be left alone, daylight though it was, for a moment.

I remember my father coming up and standing at the bedside, and talking cheerfully, and asking the nurse a number of questions, and laughing very heartily at one of the answers; and patting me on the shoulder, and kissing me, and telling me not to be frightened, that it was nothing but a dream and could not hurt me.

But I was not comforted, for I knew the visit of the strange woman was not a dream; and I was awfully frightened.

I was a little consoled by the nursery-maid's assuring me that it was she who had come and looked at me, and lain down beside me in the bed, and that I must have been half-dreaming not to have known her face. But this, though supported by the nurse, did not quite satisfy me.

I remember, in the course of that day, a venerable old man, in a black cassock, coming into the room with the nurse and housekeeper, and talking a little to them, and very kindly to me; his face was very sweet and gentle, and he told me they were going to pray, and joined my hands together, and desired me to say, softly, while they were praying, "Lord hear all good prayers for us, for Jesus' sake." I think these were the very words, for I often repeated them to myself, and my nurse used for years to make me say them in my prayers.

I remember so well the thoughtful sweet face of that white-haired old man, in his black cassock, as he stood in that rude, lofty, brown room, with the clumsy furniture of a fashion three hundred years old, about him, and the scanty light entering its shadowy atmosphere through the small lattice. He kneeled, and the three women with him, and he prayed aloud with an earnest quavering voice for, what appeared to me, a long time.

I forget all my life preceding that event, and for some time after it is all obscure also, but the scenes I have just described stand out vivid as the isolated pictures of the phantasmagoria surrounded by darkness.

II

A Guest

I am now going to tell you something so strange that it will require all your faith in my veracity to believe my story. It is not only true, nevertheless, but truth of which I have been an eye-witness.

It was a sweet summer evening, and my father asked me, as he sometimes did, to take a little ramble with him along that beautiful forest vista which I have mentioned as lying in front of the schloss.

“General Spielsdorf cannot come to us so soon as I had hoped,” said my father, as we pursued our walk.

He was to have paid us a visit of some weeks, and we had expected his arrival next day. He was to have brought with him a young lady, his niece and ward, Mademoiselle Rheinfeldt, whom I had never seen, but whom I had heard described as a very charming girl, and in whose society I had promised myself many happy days. I was more disappointed than a young lady living in a town, or a bustling neighbourhood can possibly imagine. This visit, and the new acquaintance it promised, had furnished my day dream for many weeks.

“And how soon does he come?” I asked.

“Not till autumn. Not for two months, I dare say,” he answered. “And I am very glad now, dear, that you never knew Mademoiselle Rheinfeldt.”

“And why?” I asked, both mortified and curious.

“Because the poor young lady is dead,” he replied. “I quite forgot I had not told you, but you were not in the room when I received the General’s<sup>1</sup> letter this evening.”

I was very much shocked. General Spielsdorf had mentioned in his first letter, six or seven weeks before, that she was not so well as he would wish her, but there was nothing to suggest the remotest suspicion of danger.

“Here is the General’s letter,” he said, handing it to me. “I am afraid he is in great affliction; the letter appears to me to have been written very nearly in distraction.”

We sat down on a rude bench, under a group of magnificent lime-trees. The sun was setting with all its melancholy splendour behind the sylvan horizon, and the stream that flows beside our home, and passes under the steep old bridge I have mentioned, wound through many a group of noble trees, almost at our feet, reflecting in its current the fading crimson of the sky. General Spielsdorf’s letter was so extraordinary, so vehement, and in some places so self-contradictory, that I read it twice over—the second time aloud to my father—and was still unable to account for it, except by supposing that grief had unsettled his mind.

It said “I have lost my darling daughter—for as such I loved her. During the last days of dear Bertha’s illness I was not able to write to you. Before then I had no idea of her danger. I have lost her, and now learn all, too late. She died in the peace of innocence, and in the glorious hope of a blessed futurity. The fiend who betrayed our infatuated hospitality has done it all. I thought I was receiving into my house innocence, gaiety, a charming companion for my lost Bertha. Heavens! what a fool have I been! I thank God my child died without a suspicion of the cause of her sufferings. She is gone without so much as conjecturing the nature of her illness, and the accursed passion of the agent of all this misery. I devote my remaining days to tracking and extinguishing a monster. I am told I may hope to accomplish my righteous and merciful purpose. At present there is scarcely a gleam of light to guide me. I curse my conceited incredulity, my despicable affectation of superiority, my blindness, my obstinacy—all—too late. I cannot write or talk collectedly now. I am distracted. So soon as I shall have a little recovered, I mean to devote myself for a time to enquiry, which may possibly lead me as far as Vienna. Some time in the autumn, two months hence, or earlier if I live, I will see you—that is, if you permit me; I will then tell you all that I scarce dare put upon paper now. Farewell. Pray for me, dear friend.”

1. Capitalized in In a Glass Darkly; change maintained throughout this edition.

In these terms ended this strange letter. Though I had never seen Bertha Rheinfeldt my eyes filled with tears at the sudden intelligence; I was startled, as well as profoundly disappointed.

The sun had now set, and it was twilight by the time I had returned the General’s letter to my father.

It was a soft<sup>2</sup> clear evening, and we loitered, speculating upon the possible meanings of the violent and incoherent sentences which I had just been reading. We had nearly a mile to walk before reaching the road that passes the schloss in front, and by that time the moon was shining brilliantly. At the drawbridge we met Madame Perrodon and Mademoiselle De Lafontaine, who had come out, without their bonnets, to enjoy the exquisite moonlight.

We heard their voices gabbling in animated dialogue as we approached. We joined them at the drawbridge, and turned about to admire with them the beautiful scene.

The glade through which we had just walked lay before us. At our left the narrow road wound away under clumps of lordly trees, and was lost to sight amid the thickening forest. At the right the same road crosses the steep and picturesque bridge, near which stands a ruined tower which once guarded that pass; and beyond the bridge an abrupt eminence rises, covered with trees, and showing in the shadows some grey ivy-clustered rocks.

2. “Soft” is a literal transcription of the Irish expression “Tá sé bog,” “It is soft,” which means it is a damp or rainy day.

Over the sward and low grounds a thin film of mist was stealing, like smoke, marking the distances with a transparent veil; and here and there we could see the river faintly flashing in the moonlight.

No softer, sweeter scene could be imagined. The news I had just heard made it melancholy; but nothing could disturb its character of profound serenity, and the enchanted glory and vagueness of the prospect.

My father, who enjoyed the picturesque, and I, stood looking in silence over the expanse beneath us. The two good governesses, standing a little way behind us, discoursed upon the scene, and were eloquent upon the moon.

Madame Perrodon was fat, middle-aged, and romantic, and talked and sighed poetically. Mademoiselle De Lafontaine—in right of her father, who was a German, assumed to be psychological, metaphysical, and something of a mystic—now declared that when the moon shone with a light so intense it was well known that it indicated a special spiritual activity. The effect of the full moon in such a state of brilliancy was manifold. It acted on dreams, it acted on lunacy, it acted on nervous people; it had marvellous physical influences connected with life. Mademoiselle related that her cousin, who was mate of a merchant ship, having taken a nap on deck on such a night, lying on his back, with his face full in the light of the moon, had wakened, after a dream of an old woman clawing him by the cheek, with his features horribly drawn to one side; and his countenance had never quite recovered its equilibrium.

“The moon, this night,” she said, “is full of odylic<sup>3</sup> and magnetic influence—and see, when you look behind you at the front of the schloss,

3. “Of or relating to the hypothetical force odyle or Od.” An “od” or “odyle” is defined as “a hypothetical force proposed by Baron Karl von Reichenbach as pervading all nature and accounting for various physical and psychological phenomena. The Od force was thought to manifest itself in certain persons of sensitive temperament by streaming from their fingertips, and to be exhibited especially by magnets, crystals, heat, light, and chemical action. It was held to account for the phenomena of mesmerism and animal magnetism, among other things” (OED). This word is how all its windows flash and twinkle with that silvery splendour, as if unseen hands had lighted up the rooms to receive fairy guests.”

There are indolent states of the spirits in which, indisposed to talk ourselves, the talk of others is pleasant to our listless ears; and I gazed on, pleased with the tinkle of the ladies’ conversation.

“I have got into one of my moping moods to-night,” said my father, after a silence, and quoting Shakespeare, whom, by way of keeping up our English, he used to read aloud, he said:

“‘In truth I know not why I am so sad:
It wearies me; you say it wearies you;
But how I got it—came by it.’<sup>4</sup>

“I forget the rest. But I feel as if some great misfortune were hanging over us. I suppose the poor General’s afflicted letter has had something to do with it.”

At this moment the unwonted sound of carriage wheels and many hoofs upon the road, arrested our attention.

---

converted to “idyllic” in most later editions of the text, which changes the meaning dramatically.

4. An imperfect and incomplete rendering of the opening lines of Shakespeare’s comedy The Merchant of Venice, act I, scene i:

In sooth, I know not why I am so sad;
It wearies me, you say it wearies you;
But how I caught it, found it, or came by it,
What stuff ’tis made of, whereof it is born,
I am to learn;
And such a want-wit sadness makes of me,
That I have much ado to know myself.

Given the impending arrival of the vampire Carmilla to the estate, this quote is an ironic choice: the “cargo” conveyed in the carriage that is about to arrive on the scene is not precious, as Antonio’s merchant friends speculate of his cargo, but rather a predatory vampire, and the question “how I came by it” is answered, unbeknownst to Laura’s father, by the subsequent crash. “What stuff” their sadness is “made of” and “whereof it is born” the characters in Carmilla do indeed come to learn, much to their own sadness!

They seemed to be approaching from the high ground overlooking the bridge, and very soon the equipage emerged from that point. Two horsemen first crossed the bridge, then came a carriage drawn by four horses, and two men rode behind.

It seemed to be the travelling carriage of a person of rank; and we were all immediately absorbed in watching that very unusual spectacle. It became in a few moments greatly more interesting, for just as the carriage had passed the summit of the steep bridge, one of the leaders, taking fright, communicated his panic to the rest, and after a plunge or two, the whole team broke into a wild gallop together, and dashing between the horsemen who rode in front, came thundering along the road towards us with the speed of a hurricane.<sup>5</sup>

The excitement of the scene was made more painful by the clear, long-drawn screams of a female voice from the carriage window.

We all advanced in curiosity and horror; my father in silence, the rest with various ejaculations of terror.

Our suspense did not last long. Just before you reach the castle drawbridge, on the route they were coming, there stands by the roadside a magnificent lime-tree, on the other stands an ancient stone cross, at sight of which the horses, now going at a pace that was perfectly frightful, swerved so as to bring the wheel over the projecting roots of the tree.

I knew what was coming. I covered my eyes, unable to see it out, and turned my head away; at the same moment I heard a cry from my lady-friends, who had gone on a little.

Curiosity opened my eyes, and I saw a scene of utter confusion. Two of the horses were on the ground, the carriage lay upon its side with two wheels in the air; the men were busy removing the traces, and a lady, with a commanding air and figure, had got out, and stood with clasped hands, raising the handkerchief that was in them every now and then to her eyes. Through the carriage door was now lifted a young lady, who appeared to be lifeless. My dear old father was already beside the elder lady, with his hat in his hand, evidently tendering his aid and the resources of his schloss. The lady did not appear to hear him, or to have eyes for anything but the slender girl who was being placed against the slope of the bank.

5. Commas around "taking fright" and after "plunge or two" added in In a Glass Darkly.

I approached; the young lady was apparently stunned, but she was certainly not dead. My father, who piqued himself on being something of a physician, had just had his fingers to her wrist and assured the lady, who declared herself her mother, that her pulse, though faint and irregular, was undoubtedly still distinguishable. The lady clasped her hands and looked upward, as if in a momentary transport of gratitude; but immediately she broke out again in that theatrical way which is, I believe, natural to some people.

She was what is called a fine looking woman for her time of life, and must have been handsome; she was tall, but not thin, and dressed in black velvet, and looked rather pale, but with a proud and commanding countenance, though now agitated strangely.

“Was ever being so born to calamity?” I heard her say, with clasped hands, as I came up. “Here am I, on a journey of life and death, in prosecuting which to lose an hour is possibly to lose all. My child will not have recovered sufficiently to resume her route for who can say how long. I must leave her; I cannot, dare not, delay. How far on, sir, can you tell me, is the nearest village? I must leave her there; and shall not see my darling, or even hear of her, till my return, three months hence.”

I plucked my father by the coat, and whispered earnestly in his ear: “Oh! papa, pray ask her to let her stay with us—it would be so delightful. Do, pray.”

“If Madame<sup>6</sup> will entrust her child to the care of my daughter, and of her good gouvernante, Madame Perrodon, and permit her to remain as our guest, under my charge, until her return, it will confer

6. Capitalized in In a Glass Darkly; change maintained throughout this edition.

a distinction and an obligation upon us, and we shall treat her with all the care and devotion which so sacred a trust deserves.”

“I cannot do that, sir, it would be to task your kindness and chivalry too cruelly,” said the lady, distractedly.

“It would, on the contrary, be to confer on us a very great kindness at the moment when we most need it. My daughter has just been disappointed by a cruel misfortune, in a visit from which she had long anticipated a great deal of happiness. If you confide this young lady to our care it will be her best consolation. The nearest village on your route is distant, and affords no such inn as you could think of placing your daughter at; you cannot allow her to continue her journey for any considerable distance without danger. If, as you say, you cannot suspend your journey, you must part with her to-night, and nowhere could you do so with more honest assurances of care and tenderness than here.”

There was something in this lady’s air and appearance so distinguished, and even imposing, and in her manner so engaging, as to impress one, quite apart from the dignity of her equipage, with a conviction that she was a person of consequence.

By this time the carriage was replaced in its upright position, and the horses, quite tractable, in the traces again.

The lady threw on her daughter a glance which I fancied was not quite so affectionate as one might have anticipated from the beginning of the scene; then she beckoned slightly to my father, and withdrew two or three steps with him out of hearing; and talked to him with a fixed and stern countenance, not at all like that with which she had hitherto spoken.

I was filled with wonder that my father did not seem to perceive the change, and also unspeakably curious to learn what it could be that she was speaking, almost in his ear, with so much earnestness and rapidity.

Two or three minutes at most I think she remained thus employed, then she turned, and a few steps brought her to where her daughter lay, supported by Madame Perrodon. She kneeled beside her a moment and whispered, as Madame supposed, a little benediction in her ear; then hastily kissing her she stepped into her carriage, the door was closed, the footmen in stately liveries jumped up behind, the outriders spurred on, the postillions cracked their whips, the horses plunged and broke suddenly into a furious canter that threatened soon again to become a gallop, and the carriage whirled away, followed at the same rapid pace by the two horsemen in the rear.

III

We Compare Notes

We followed the cortege<sup>1</sup> with our eyes until it was swiftly lost to sight in the misty wood; and the very sound of the hoofs and the wheels died away in the silent night air.

Nothing remained to assure us that the adventure had not been an illusion of a moment but the young lady, who just at that moment opened her eyes. I could not see, for her face was turned from me, but she raised her head, evidently looking about her, and I heard a very sweet voice ask complainingly, “Where is mamma?”

Our good Madame Perrodon answered tenderly, and added some comfortable assurances.

I then heard her ask:

“Where am I? What is this place?” and after that she said, “I don’t see the carriage; and Matska, where is she?”

Madame answered all her questions in so far as she understood them; and gradually the young lady remembered how the misadventure came about, and was glad to hear that no one in, or in attendance on, the carriage was hurt; and on learning that her mamma had left her here, till her return in about three months, she wept.

I was going to add my consolations to those of Madame Perrodon when Mademoiselle De Lafontaine placed her hand upon my arm, saying:

1. Italics added in In a Glass Darkly.

“Don’t approach, one at a time is as much as she can at present converse with; a very little excitement would possibly overpower her now.”

As soon as she is comfortably in bed, I thought, I will run up to her room and see her.

My father in the meantime had sent a servant on horseback for the physician, who lived about two leagues away; and a bedroom was being prepared for the young lady’s reception.

The stranger now rose, and leaning on Madame’s arm, walked slowly over the drawbridge and into the castle gate.

In the hall,<sup>2</sup> servants waited to receive her, and she was conducted forthwith to her room.

The room we usually sat in as our drawing-room is long, having four windows, that looked over the moat and drawbridge, upon the forest scene I have just described.

It is furnished in old carved oak, with large carved cabinets, and the chairs are cushioned with crimson Utrecht velvet.<sup>3</sup> The walls are covered with tapestry, and surrounded with great gold frames, the figures being as large as life, in ancient and very curious costume, and the subjects represented are hunting, hawking, and generally festive. It is not too stately to be extremely comfortable; and here we had our tea, for with his usual patriotic leanings he insisted that the national beverage should make its appearance regularly with our coffee and chocolate.

We sat here this night, and with candles lighted, were talking over the adventure of the evening.

Madame Perrodon and Mademoiselle De Lafontaine were both of our party. The young stranger had hardly lain down in her bed when she sank into a deep sleep; and those ladies had left her in the care of a servant.

“How do you like our guest?” I asked, as soon as Madame entered. “Tell me all about her?”

2. Comma added in In a Glass Darkly.

3. A particular plush type of velvet from Utrecht, Holland.

"I like her extremely," answered Madame, "she is, I almost think, the prettiest creature I ever saw; about your age, and so gentle and nice."

"She is absolutely beautiful," threw in Mademoiselle, who had peeped for a moment into the stranger's room.

"And such a sweet voice!" added Madame Perrodon.

"Did you remark a woman in the carriage, after it was set up again, who did not get out," inquired Mademoiselle, "but only looked from the window?"

"No, we had not seen her."

Then she described a hideous black woman, with a sort of coloured turban on her head, who was gazing all the time from the carriage window, nodding and grinning derisively towards the ladies, with gleaming eyes and large white eye-balls, and her teeth set as if in fury.

"Did you remark what an ill-looking pack of men the servants were?" asked Madame.

"Yes," said my father, who had just come in, "Ugly, hang-dog looking fellows, as ever I beheld in my life. I hope they mayn't rob the poor lady in the forest. They are clever rogues, however; they got everything to rights in a minute."

"I dare say they are worn out with too long travelling," said Madame; "Besides looking wicked, their faces were so strangely lean, and dark, and sullen. I am very curious, I own; but I dare say the young lady will tell us all about it to-morrow, if she is sufficiently recovered."

"I don't think she will," said my father, with a mysterious smile, and a little nod of his head, as if he knew more about it than he cared to tell us.

This made me all the more inquisitive as to what had passed between him and the lady in the black velvet, in the brief but earnest interview that had immediately preceded her departure.

We were scarcely alone, when I entreated him to tell me. He did not need much pressing.

"There is no particular reason why I should not tell you. She expressed a reluctance to trouble us with the care of her daughter, saying that she was in delicate health, and nervous, but not subject to any kind of seizure—she volunteered that—nor to any illusion; being, in fact, perfectly sane.”

“How very odd to say all that!” I interpolated, “It was so unnecessary.”

“At all events it was said,” he laughed, “and as you wish to know all that passed, which was indeed very little, I tell you. She then said, ‘I am making a long journey of vital importance’—she emphasized the word—‘rapid and secret; I shall return for my child in three months; in the meantime, she will be silent as to who we are, whence we come, and whither we are travelling.’ That is all she said. She spoke very pure French. When she said the word ‘secret,’ she paused for a few seconds, looking sternly, her eyes fixed on mine. I fancy she makes a great point of that. You saw how quickly she was gone. I hope I have not done a very foolish thing, in taking charge of the young lady.”

For my part, I was delighted. I was longing to see and talk to her; and only waiting till the doctor should give me leave. You, who live in towns, can have no idea how great an event the introduction of a new friend is, in such a solitude as surrounded us.

The doctor did not arrive till nearly one o’clock; but I could no more have gone to my bed and slept, than I could have overtaken, on foot, the carriage in which the princess in black velvet had driven away.

When the physician came down to the drawing-room, it was to report very favourably upon his patient. She was now sitting up, her pulse quite regular, apparently perfectly well. She had sustained no injury, and the little shock to her nerves had passed away quite harmlessly. There could be no harm certainly in my seeing her, if we both wished it; and, with this permission, I sent, forthwith, to know whether she would allow me to visit her for a few minutes in her room.

The servant returned immediately to say that she desired nothing more.

You may be sure I was not long in availing myself of this permission.

Our visitor lay in one of the handsomest rooms in the schloss. It was, perhaps, a little stately. There was a sombre piece of tapestry opposite the foot of the bed, representing Cleopatra with the asps to her bosom; and other solemn classic scenes were displayed, a little faded, upon the other walls. But there was gold carving, and rich and varied colour enough in the other decorations of the room, to more than redeem the gloom of the old tapestry.

There were candles at the bed side. She was sitting up; her slender pretty figure enveloped in the soft silk dressing gown, embroidered with flowers, and lined with thick quilted silk, which her mother had thrown over her feet as she lay upon the ground.

What was it that, as I reached the bed-side and had just begun my little greeting, struck me dumb in a moment, and made me recoil a step or two from before her? I will tell you.

I saw the very face which had visited me in my childhood at night, which remained so fixed in my memory, and on which I had for so many years so often ruminated with horror, when no one suspected of what I was thinking.

It was pretty, even beautiful; and when I first beheld it, wore the same melancholy expression.

But this almost instantly lighted into a strange fixed smile of recognition.

There was a silence of fully a minute, and then at length she spoke; I could not.

“How wonderful!” she exclaimed, “Twelve years ago, I saw your face in a dream, and it has haunted me ever since.”

“Wonderful, indeed!” I repeated, overcoming with an effort the horror that had for a time suspended my utterances. “Twelve years ago, in vision or reality, I certainly saw you. I could not forget your face. It has remained before my eyes ever since.”

Her smile had softened. Whatever I had fancied strange in it, was gone, and it and her dimpling cheeks were now delightfully pretty and intelligent.

I felt reassured, and continued more in the vein which hospitality indicated, to bid her welcome, and to tell her how much pleasure her accidental arrival had given us all, and especially what a happiness it was to me.

I took her hand as I spoke. I was a little shy, as lonely people are, but the situation made me eloquent, and even bold. She pressed my hand, she laid hers upon it, and her eyes glowed, as, looking hastily into mine, she smiled again, and blushed.

She answered my welcome very prettily. I sat down beside her, still wondering; and she said:

“I must tell you my vision about you; it is so very strange that you and I should have had, each of the other so vivid a dream, that each should have seen, I you and you me, looking as we do now, when of course we both were mere children. I was a child, about six years old, and I awoke from a confused and troubled dream, and found myself in a room, unlike my nursery, wainscoted clumsily in some dark wood, and with cupboards and bedsteads, and chairs, and benches placed about it. The beds were, I thought, all empty, and the room itself without anyone but myself in it; and I, after looking about me for some time, and admiring especially an iron candlestick, with two branches, which I should certainly know again, crept under one of the beds to reach the window; but as I got from under the bed, I heard someone crying; and looking up, while I was still upon my knees, I saw you—most assuredly you—as I see you now; a beautiful young lady, with golden hair and large blue eyes, and lips—your lips—you, as you are here. Your looks won me; I climbed on the bed and put my arms about you, and I think we both fell asleep. I was roused by a scream; you were sitting up screaming. I was frightened, and slipped down upon the ground, and, it seemed to me, lost consciousness for a moment; and when I came to myself, I was again in my nursery at home. Your face I have never forgotten since. I could not be misled by mere resemblance. You are the lady whom I then saw.”

It was now my turn to relate my corresponding vision, which I did, to the undisguised wonder of my new acquaintance.

“I don’t know which should be most afraid of the other,” she said, again smiling—“If you were less pretty I think I should be very much afraid of you, but being as you are, and you and I both so young, I feel only that I have made your acquaintance twelve years ago, and have already a right to your intimacy; at all events it does seem as if we were destined, from our earliest childhood, to be friends. I wonder whether you feel as strangely drawn towards me as I do to you; I have never had a friend—shall I find one now?” She sighed, and her fine dark eyes gazed passionately on me.

Now the truth is, I felt rather unaccountably towards the beautiful stranger. I did feel, as she said, “drawn towards her,” but there was also something of repulsion. In this ambiguous feeling, however, the sense of attraction immensely prevailed. She interested and won me; she was so beautiful and so indescribably engaging.

I perceived now something of languor and exhaustion stealing over her, and hastened to bid her good night.

“The doctor thinks,” I added, “that you ought to have a maid to sit up with you to-night; one of ours is waiting, and you will find her a very useful and quiet creature.”

“How kind of you, but I could not sleep, I never could with an attendant in the room. I shan’t require any assistance—and, shall I confess my weakness, I am haunted with a terror of robbers. Our house was robbed once, and two servants murdered, so I always lock my door. It has become a habit—and you look so kind I know you will forgive me. I see there is a key in the lock.”

She held me close in her pretty arms for a moment and whispered in my ear, “Good night, darling, it is very hard to part with you, but good night; to-morrow, but not early, I shall see you again.”

She sank back on the pillow with a sigh, and her fine eyes followed me with a fond and melancholy gaze, and she murmured again, “Good night, dear friend.”

Young people like, and even love, on impulse. I was flattered by the evident, though as yet undeserved, fondness she showed me. I liked the confidence with which she at once received me. She was determined that we should be very near friends.

Next day came and we met again. I was delighted with my companion; that is to say, in many respects.

Her looks lost nothing in daylight—she was certainly the most beautiful creature I had ever seen, and the unpleasant remembrance of the face presented in my early dream, had lost the effect of the first unexpected recognition.

She confessed that she had experienced a similar shock on seeing me, and precisely the same faint antipathy that had mingled with my admiration of her. We now laughed together over our momentary horrors.

IV

Her Habits—A Saunter

I TOLD you that I was charmed with her in most particulars.

There were some that did not please me so well.

She was above the middle height of women. I shall begin by describing her. She was slender, and wonderfully graceful. Except that her movements were languid—very languid—indeed, there was nothing in her appearance to indicate an invalid. Her complexion was rich and brilliant; her features were small and beautifully formed; her eyes large, dark, and lustrous; her hair was quite wonderful, I never saw hair so magnificently thick and long when it was down about her shoulders; I have often placed my hands under it, and laughed with wonder at its weight. It was exquisitely fine and soft, and in colour a rich very dark brown, with something of gold. I loved to let it down, tumbling with its own weight, as, in her room, she lay back in her chair talking in her sweet low voice, I used to fold and braid it, and spread it out and play with it. Heavens! If I had but known all!

I said there were particulars which did not please me. I have told you that her confidence won me the first night I saw her; but I found that she exercised with respect to herself, her mother, her history, everything in fact connected with her life, plans, and people, an ever wakeful reserve. I dare say I was unreasonable, perhaps I was wrong; I dare say I ought to have respected the solemn injunction laid upon my father by the stately lady in black velvet. But curiosity is a restless and unscrupulous passion, and no one girl can endure, with patience, that her's<sup>1</sup> should be baffled by another. What harm could it do anyone to tell me what I so ardently desired to know? Had she no trust in my good sense or honour? Why would she not believe me when I assured her, so solemnly, that I would not divulge one syllable of what she told me to any mortal breathing.

There was a coldness, it seemed to me, beyond her years, in her smiling melancholy persistent refusal to afford me the least ray of light.

I cannot say we quarrelled upon this point, for she would not quarrel upon any. It was, of course, very unfair of me to press her, very ill-bred, but I really could not help it; and I might just as well have let it alone.

What she did tell me amounted, in my unconscionable estimation to—nothing.

It was all summed up in three very vague disclosures:

First.—Her name was Carmilla.

Second.—Her family was very ancient and noble.

Third.—Her home lay in the direction of the west.

She would not tell me the name of her family, nor their armorial bearings, nor the name of their estate, nor even that of the country they lived in.

You are not to suppose that I worried her incessantly on these subjects. I watched opportunity, and rather insinuated than urged my inquiries. Once or twice, indeed, I did attack her more directly. But no matter what my tactics, utter failure was invariably the result. Reproaches and caresses were all lost upon her. But I must add this, that her evasion was conducted with so pretty a melancholy and deprecation, with so many, and even passionate declarations of her liking for me, and trust in my honour, and with so many promises that I should at last know all, that I could not find it in my heart long to be offended with her.

1. An irregular (and grammatically unsound) form of the possessive pronoun hers.

She used to place her pretty arms about my neck, draw me to her, and laying her cheek to mine, murmur with her lips near my ear, "Dearest, your little heart is wounded; think me not cruel because I obey the irresistible law of my strength and weakness; if your dear heart is wounded, my wild heart bleeds with yours. In the rapture of my enormous humiliation I live in your warm life, and you shall die—die, sweetly die—into mine. I cannot help it; as I draw near to you, you, in your turn, will draw near to others, and learn the rapture of that cruelty, which yet is love; so for a while, seek to know no more of me and mine, but trust me with all your loving spirit."

And when she had spoken such a rhapsody, she would press me more closely in her trembling embrace, and her lips in soft kisses gently glow upon my cheek.

Her agitations and her language were unintelligible to me.

From these foolish embraces, which were not of very frequent occurrence, I must allow, I used to wish to extricate myself; but my energies seemed to fail me. Her murmured words sounded like a lullaby in my ear, and soothed my resistance into a trance, from which I only seemed to recover myself when she withdrew her arms.

In these mysterious moods I did not like her. I experienced a strange tumultuous excitement that was pleasurable, ever and anon, mingled with a vague sense of fear and disgust. I had no distinct thoughts about her while such scenes lasted, but I was conscious of a love growing into adoration, and also of abhorrence. This I know is paradox, but I can make no other attempt to explain the feeling.

I now write, after an interval of more than ten years, with a trembling hand, with a confused and horrible recollection of certain occurrences and situations, in the ordeal through which I was unconsciously passing; though with a vivid and very sharp remembrance of the main current of my story. But, I suspect, in all lives there are certain emotional scenes, those in which our passions have been most wildly and terribly roused, that are of all others the most vaguely and dimly remembered.

Sometimes after an hour of apathy, my strange and beautiful companion would take my hand and hold it with a fond pressure, renewed again and again; blushing softly, gazing in my face with languid and burning eyes, and breathing so fast that her dress rose and fell with the tumultuous respiration. It was like the ardour of a lover; it embarrassed me; it was hateful and yet overpowering; and with gloating eyes she drew me to her, and her hot lips travelled along my cheek in kisses; and she would whisper, almost in sobs, "You are mine, you shall be mine, you and I are one for ever." Then she has thrown herself back in her chair, with her small hands over her eyes, leaving me trembling.

"Are we related," I used to ask; "what can you mean by all this? I remind you perhaps of someone whom you love; but you must not, I hate it; I don't know you—I don't know myself when you look so and talk so."

She used to sigh at my vehemence, then turn away and drop my hand.

Respecting these very extraordinary manifestations I strove in vain to form any satisfactory theory—I could not refer them to affectation or trick. It was unmistakably the momentary breaking out of suppressed instinct and emotion. Was she, notwithstanding her mother's volunteered denial, subject to brief visitations of insanity; or was there here a disguise and a romance? I had read in old story books of such things. What if a boyish lover had found his way into the house, and sought to prosecute his suit in masquerade, with the assistance of a clever old adventuress. But there were many things against this hypothesis, highly interesting as it was to my vanity.

I could boast of no little attentions such as masculine gallantry delights to offer. Between these passionate moments there were long intervals of commonplace, of gaiety, of brooding melancholy, during which, except that I detected her eyes so full of melancholy fire, following me, at times I might have been as nothing to her. Except in these brief periods of mysterious excitement her ways were girlish; and there was always a languor about her, quite incompatible with a masculine system in a state of health.

In some respects her habits were odd. Perhaps not so singular in the opinion of a town lady like you, as they appeared to us rustic people. She used to come down very late, generally not till one o'clock, she would then take a cup of chocolate, but eat nothing; we then went out for a walk, which was a mere saunter, and she seemed, almost immediately, exhausted, and either returned to the schloss or sat on one of the benches that were placed, here and there, among the trees. This was a bodily languor in which her mind did not sympathise. She was always an animated talker, and very intelligent.

She sometimes alluded for a moment to her own home, or mentioned an adventure or situation, or an early recollection, which indicated a people of strange manners, and described customs of which we knew nothing. I gathered from these chance hints that her native country was much more remote than I had at first fancied.

As we sat thus one afternoon under the trees a funeral passed us by. It was that of a pretty young girl, whom I had often seen, the daughter of one of the rangers of the forest. The poor man was walking behind the coffin of his darling; she was his only child, and he looked quite heartbroken. Peasants walking two-and-two came behind, they were singing a funeral hymn.

I rose to mark my respect as they passed, and joined in the hymn they were very sweetly singing.

My companion shook me a little roughly, and I turned surprised.

She said, brusquely, "Don't you perceive how discordant that is?"

"I think it very sweet, on the contrary," I answered, vexed at the interruption, and very uncomfortable, lest the people who composed the little procession should observe and resent what was passing.

I resumed, therefore, instantly, and was again interrupted. "You pierce my ears," said Carmilla, almost angrily, and stopping her ears with her tiny fingers. "Besides, how can you tell that your religion and mine are the same; your forms wound me, and I hate funerals. What a fuss! Why you must die—everyone must die; and all are happier when they do. Come home."

"My father has gone on with the clergyman to the churchyard. I thought you knew she was to be buried to day."

"She? I don't trouble my head about peasants. I don't know who she is," answered Carmilla, with a flash from her fine eyes.

“She is the poor girl who fancied she saw a ghost a fortnight ago, and has been dying ever since, till yesterday, when she expired.”

“Tell me nothing about ghosts. I shan’t sleep to-night if you do.”

“I hope there is no plague or fever coming; all this looks very like it,” I continued. “The swineherd’s young wife died only a week ago, and she thought something seized her by the throat as she lay in her bed, and nearly strangled her. Papa says such horrible fancies do accompany some forms of fever. She was quite well the day before. She sank afterwards, and died before a week.”

“Well, her funeral is over, I hope, and her hymn sung; and our ears shan’t be tortured with that discord and jargon. It has made me nervous. Sit down here, beside me; sit close; hold my hand; press it hard—hard—harder.”

We had moved a little back, and had come to another seat.

She sat down. Her face underwent a change that alarmed and even terrified me for a moment. It darkened, and became horribly livid; her teeth and hands were clenched, and she frowned and compressed her lips, while she stared down upon the ground at her feet, and trembled all over with a continued shudder as irrepressible as ague. All her energies seemed strained to suppress a fit, with which she was then breathlessly tugging; and at length a low convulsive cry of suffering broke from her, and gradually the hysteria subsided. “There! That comes of strangling people with hymns!” she said at last. “Hold me, hold me still. It is passing away.”

And so gradually it did; and perhaps to dissipate the sombre impression which the spectacle had left upon me, she became unusually animated and chatty; and so we got home.

This was the first time I had seen her exhibit any definable symptoms of that delicacy of health which her mother had spoken of. It was the first time, also, I had seen her exhibit anything like temper.

Both passed away like a summer cloud; and never but once afterwards did I witness on her part a momentary sign of anger. I will tell you how it happened.

She and I were looking out of one of the long drawing-room windows, when there entered the court-yard, over the drawbridge, a figure of a wanderer whom I knew very well. He used to visit the schloss generally twice a year.

It was the figure of a hunchback, with the sharp lean features that generally accompany deformity. He wore a pointed black beard, and he was smiling from ear to ear, showing his white fangs. He was dressed in buff, black, and scarlet, and crossed with more straps and belts than I could count, from which hung all manner of things. Behind, he carried a magic-lantern,<sup>2</sup> and two boxes, which I well knew, in one of which was a salamander, and in the other a mandrake.<sup>3</sup> These monsters used to make my father laugh. They were compounded of parts of monkeys, parrots, squirrels, fish, and hedgehogs, dried and stitched together with great neatness and startling effect. He had a fiddle, a box of conjuring apparatus, a pair of foils and masks<sup>4</sup> attached to his belt, several other mysterious cases dangling about him, and a black staff with copper ferrules<sup>5</sup> in his hand. His companion was a rough spare dog, that followed at his heels, but stopped short, suspiciously at the drawbridge, and in a little while began to howl dismally.

In the meantime, the mountebank,<sup>6</sup> standing in the midst of the courtyard, raised his grotesque hat, and made us a very ceremonious bow, paying his compliments very volubly in execrable French, and German not much better. Then, disengaging his fiddle, he began to scrape a lively air, to which he sang with a merry discord, dancing with ludicrous airs and activity, that made me laugh, in spite of the dog's howling.

Then he advanced to the window with many smiles and salutations, and his hat in his left hand, his fiddle under his arm, and with a fluency that never took breath, he gabbled a long advertisement of all

2. A simple optical device using slides to display a magnified image on a white screen, wall, etc., in a darkened room (OED).

3. A poisonous plant thought to resemble humans and to have magical properties as an ingredient.

4. Instruments used in the sport of fencing.

5. Metal rings used to reinforce the tips of a staff or cane.

6. A public salesman of fake medicines, charms, and such things.

1. Engraving of “Carmilla,” drawn by M. Fitzgerald, engraved by C. M. Jenkin. From The Dark Blue, Dec. 1871. Courtesy of the Special Collections/Research Center, Syracuse University Library.

his accomplishments, and the resources of the various arts which he placed at our service, and the curiosities and entertainments which it was in his power, at our bidding, to display.

“Will your ladyships be pleased to buy an amulet against the oupire,<sup>7</sup> which is going like the wolf, I hear, through these woods,”

7. Alternate spelling of vampire, probably meant here to give the usage a local or Eastern flavor.

he said, dropping his hat on the pavement. "They are dying of it right and left, and here is a charm that never fails; only pinned to the pillow, and you may laugh in his face."

These charms consisted of oblong slips of vellum, with cabalistic ciphers and diagrams upon them.

Carmilla instantly purchased one, and so did I.

He was looking up, and we were smiling down upon him, amused; at least, I can answer for myself. His piercing black eye, as he looked up in our faces, seemed to detect something that fixed for a moment his curiosity.

In an instant he unrolled a leather case, full of all manner of odd little steel instruments.

"See here, my lady," he said, displaying it, and addressing me, "I profess, among other things less useful, the art of dentistry. Plague take the dog!" he interpolated. "Silence, beast! He howls so that your ladyships can scarcely hear a word. Your noble friend, the young lady at your right, has the sharpest tooth,—long, thin, pointed, like an awl, like a needle; ha, ha! With my sharp and long sight, as I look up, I have seen it distinctly; now if it happens to hurt the young lady, and I think it must, here am I, here are my file, my punch, my nippers; I will make it round and blunt, if her ladyship pleases; no longer the tooth of a fish, but of a beautiful young lady as she is. Hey? Is the young lady displeased? Have I been too bold? Have I offended her?"

The young lady, indeed, looked very angry as she drew back from the window.

"How dares that mountebank insult us so? Where is your father? I shall demand redress from him. My father would have had the wretch tied up to the pump, and flogged with a cart-whip, and burnt to the bones with the castle brand!"

She retired from the window a step or two, and sat down, and had hardly lost sight of the offender, when her wrath subsided as suddenly as it had risen, and she gradually recovered her usual tone, and seemed to forget the little hunchback and his follies.

My father was out of spirits that evening. On coming in he told us that there had been another case very similar to the two fatal ones which had lately occurred. The sister of a young peasant on his estate, only a mile away, was very ill, had been, as she described it, attacked very nearly in the same way, and was now slowly but steadily sinking.

“All this,” said my father, “is strictly referable to natural causes. These poor people infect one another with their superstitions, and so repeat in imagination the images of terror that have infested their neighbours.”

“But that very circumstance frightens one horribly,” said Carmilla.

“How so?” inquired my father.

“I am so afraid of fancying I see such things; I think it would be as bad as reality.”

“We are in God’s hands; nothing can happen without his permission, and all will end well for those who love him. He is our faithful creator; He has made us all, and will take care of us.”

“Creator! Nature!” said the young lady in answer to my gentle father. “And this disease that invades the country is natural. Nature. All things proceed from Nature—don’t they? All things in the heaven, in the earth, and under the earth, act and live as Nature ordains? I think so.”

“The doctor said he would come here to-day,” said my father, after a silence. “I want to know what he thinks about it, and what he thinks we had better do.”

“Doctors never did me any good,” said Carmilla.

“Then you have been ill?” I asked.

“More ill than ever you were,” she answered.

“Long ago?”

“Yes, a long time. I suffered from this very illness; but I forget all but my pain and weakness, and they were not so bad as are suffered in other diseases.”

“You were very young then?”

“I dare say; let us talk no more of it. You would not wound a friend?” She looked languidly in my eyes, and passed her arm round my waist lovingly, and led me out of the room. My father was busy over some papers near the window.

“Why does your papa like to frighten us?” said the pretty girl, with a sigh and a little shudder.

“He doesn’t, dear Camilla, it is the very furthest thing from his mind.”

“Are you afraid, dearest?”

“I should be very much if I fancied there was any real danger of my being attacked as those poor people were.”

“You are afraid to die?”

“Yes, every one is.”

“But to die as lovers may—to die together, so that they may live together. Girls are caterpillars while they live in the world, to be finally butterflies when the summer comes; but in the meantime there are grubs and larvae, don’t you see—each with their peculiar propensities, necessities, and structure. So says Monsieur Buffon,<sup>8</sup> in his big book, in the next room.”

Later in the day the doctor came, and was closeted with papa for some time. He was a skilful man, of sixty and upwards, he wore powder, and shaved his pale face as smooth as a pumpkin. He and papa emerged from the room together, and I heard papa laugh, and say as they came out:

“Well, I do wonder at a wise man like you. What do you say to hippogriffs<sup>9</sup> and dragons?”

The doctor was smiling, and made answer, shaking his head—

“Nevertheless life and death are mysterious states, and we know little of the resources of either.”

And so they walked on, and I heard no more. I did not then know what the doctor had been broaching, but I think I guess it now.

8. Likely a reference to Georges-Louis Leclerc, Comte de Buffon, an influential eighteenth-century scientist and expert on natural history and author of Les époques de la nature (Paris: De l’Imprimerie Royale, 1780).

9. A mythical creature that is half horse and half griffin.

V

A Wonderful Likeness

This evening there arrived from Gratz<sup>1</sup> the grave, dark-faced son of the picture cleaner, with a horse and cart laden with two large packing cases, having many pictures in each. It was a journey of ten leagues, and whenever a messenger arrived at the schloss from our little capital of Gratz, we used to crowd about him in the hall, to hear the news.

This arrival created in our secluded quarters quite a sensation. The cases remained in the hall, and the messenger was taken charge of by the servants till he had eaten his supper. Then with assistants, and armed with hammer, ripping-chisel, and turnscrew,<sup>2</sup> he met us in the hall, where we had assembled to witness the unpacking of the cases.

Carmilla sat looking listlessly on, while one after the other the old pictures, nearly all portraits, which had undergone the process of renovation, were brought to light. My mother was of an old Hungarian family, and most of these pictures, which were about to be restored to their places, had come to us through her.

My father had a list in his hand, from which he read, as the artist rummaged out the corresponding numbers. I don't know that the pictures were very good, but they were, undoubtedly, very old, and some of them very curious also. They had, for the most part, the merit of being now seen by me, I may say, for the first time; for the smoke and dust of time had all but obliterated them.

1. A reference to Graz, the capital of the Styrian state in Austria.

2. A screwdriver.

“There is a picture that I have not seen yet,” said my father. “In one corner, at the top of it, is the name, as well as I could read, ‘Marcia Karnstein,’ and the date ‘1698’; and I am curious to see how it has turned out.”

I remembered it; it was a small picture, about a foot and a half high, and nearly square, without a frame; but it was so blackened by age that I could not make it out.

The artist now produced it, with evident pride. It was quite beautiful; it was startling; it seemed to live. It was the effigy<sup>3</sup> of Carmilla!

“Carmilla, dear, here is an absolute miracle. Here you are, living, smiling, ready to speak, in this picture. Isn’t it beautiful, papa? And see, even the little mole on her throat.”

My father laughed, and said “Certainly it is a wonderful likeness,” but he looked away, and to my surprise seemed but little struck by it, and went on talking to the picture cleaner, who was also something of an artist, and discoursed with intelligence about the portraits or other works, which his art had just brought out into light and colour, while I was more and more lost in wonder the more I looked at the picture.

“Will you let me hang this picture in my room, papa?” I asked.

“Certainly, dear,” said he, smiling, “I’m very glad you think it so like. It must be prettier even than I thought it, if it is.”

The young lady did not acknowledge this pretty speech, did not seem to hear it. She was leaning back in her seat, her fine eyes under their long lashes gazing on me in contemplation, and she smiled in a kind of rapture.

“And now you can read quite plainly the name that is written in the corner. It is not Marcia; it looks as if it was done in gold. The name is Mircalla, Countess Karnstein, and this is a little coronet over it, and

3. As used here, meaning “a model likeness.”

underneath A.D. 1698. I am descended from the Karnsteins; that is, mamma was.”

“Ah!” said the lady, languidly, “so am I, I think, a very long descent, very ancient. Are there any Karnsteins living now?”

“None who bear the name, I believe. The family were ruined, I believe, in some civil wars, long ago, but the ruins of the castle are only about three miles away.”

“How interesting!” she said, languidly, “But see what beautiful moonlight!” She glanced through the hall-door, which stood a little open. “Suppose you take a little ramble round the court, and look down at the road and river.”

“It is so like the night you came to us,” I said.

She sighed, smiling.

She rose, and each with her arm about the other’s waist, we walked out upon the pavement.

In silence, slowly we walked down to the drawbridge, where the beautiful landscape opened before us.

“And so you were thinking of the night I came here?” she almost whispered. “Are you glad I came?”

“Delighted, dear Carmilla,” I answered.

“And you asked for the picture you think like me, to hang in your room,” she murmured with a sigh, as she drew her arm closer about my waist, and let her pretty head sink upon my shoulder.

“How romantic you are, Carmilla,” I said. “Whenever you tell me your story, it will be made up chiefly of some one great romance.”

She kissed me silently.

“I am sure, Carmilla, you have been in love; that there is, at this moment, an affair of the heart going on.”

“I have been in love with no one, and never shall,” she whispered, “unless it should be with you.”<sup>4</sup>

How beautiful she looked in the moonlight!

4. The uncapitalized “unless” was given in In a Glass Darkly.

Shy and strange was the look with which she quickly hid her face in my neck and hair, with tumultuous sighs, that seemed almost to sob, and pressed in mine a hand that trembled.

Her soft cheek was glowing against mine. "Darling, darling," she murmured, "I live in you; and you would die for me, I love you so."

I started from her.

She was gazing on me with eyes from which all fire, all meaning had flown, and a face colourless and apathetic.

"Is there a chill in the air, dear?" she said drowsily. "I almost shiver; have I been dreaming? Let us come in. Come; come; come in."

"You look ill, Carmilla; a little faint. You certainly must take some wine," I said.<sup>5</sup>

"Yes, I will. I'm better now. I shall be quite well in a few minutes. Yes, do give me a little wine," answered Carmilla, as we approached the door. "Let us look again for a minute; it is the last time, perhaps, I shall see the moonlight with you."

"How do you feel now, dear Carmilla? Are you really better?" I asked.

I was beginning to take alarm, lest she should have been stricken with the strange epidemic that they said had invaded the country about us.

"Papa would be grieved beyond measure," I added, "if he thought you were ever so little ill, without immediately letting us know. We have a very skilful doctor near this, the physician who was with papa to-day."

"I'm sure he is. I know how kind you all are; but, dear child, I am quite well again. There is nothing ever wrong with me, but a little weakness. People say I am languid; I am incapable of exertion; I can scarcely walk as far as a child of three years old; and every now and then the little strength I have falters, and I become as you have just seen me. But after all I am very easily set up again; in a moment I am perfectly myself. See how I have recovered."

5. In this sentence, "certainly" was added in In a Glass Darkly.

So, indeed, she had; and she and I talked a great deal, and very animated she was; and the remainder of that evening passed without any recurrence of what I called her infatuations. I mean her crazy talk and looks, which embarrassed, and even frightened me.

But there occurred that night an event which gave my thoughts quite a new turn, and seemed to startle even Carmilla's languid nature into momentary energy.

VI

A Very Strange Agony

When we got into the drawing-room, and had sat down to our coffee and chocolate, although Carmilla did not take any, she seemed quite herself again, and Madame, and Mademoiselle De LaFontaine, joined us, and made a little card party, in the course of which papa came in for what he called his “dish of tea.”

When the game was over he sat down beside Carmilla on the sofa, and asked her, a little anxiously, whether she had heard from her mother since her arrival.

She answered “No.”

He then asked whether she knew where a letter would reach her at present.

“I cannot tell,” she answered ambiguously, “but I have been thinking of leaving you; you have been already too hospitable and too kind to me. I have given you an infinity of trouble, and I should wish to take a carriage to-morrow, and post in pursuit of her; I know where I shall ultimately find her, although I dare not yet tell you.”

“But you must not dream of any such thing,” exclaimed my father, to my great relief. “We can’t afford to lose you so, and I won’t consent to your leaving us, except under the care of your mother, who was so good as to consent to your remaining with us till she should herself return. I should be quite happy if I knew that you heard from her; but this evening the accounts of the progress of the mysterious disease that has invaded our neighbourhood, grow even more alarming; and my beautiful guest, I do feel the responsibility, unaided by advice from your mother, very much. But I shall do my best; and one thing is certain, that you must not think of leaving us without her distinct direction to that effect. We should suffer too much in parting from you to consent to it easily."

"Thank you, sir, a thousand times for your hospitality," she answered, smiling bashfully. "You have all been too kind to me; I have seldom been so happy in all my life before, as in your beautiful chateau, under your care, and in the society of your dear daughter."

So he gallantly, in his old-fashioned way, kissed her hand, smiling and pleased at her little speech.

I accompanied Carmilla as usual to her room, and sat and chatted with her while she was preparing for bed.

"Do you think," I said at length, "that you will ever confide fully in me?"

She turned round smiling, but made no answer, only continued to smile on me.

"You won't answer that?" I said. "You can't answer pleasantly; perhaps I ought not to have asked you."

"You were quite right to ask me that, or anything. You do not know how dear you are to me, or you could not think any confidence too great to look for. But I am under vows, no nun half so awfully, and I dare not tell my story yet, even to you. The time is very near when you shall know everything. You will think me cruel, very selfish, but love is always selfish; the more ardent the more selfish. How jealous I am you cannot know. You must come with me, loving me, to death; or else hate me and still come with me, and hating me through death and after. There is no such word as indifference in my apathetic nature."

"Now, Carmilla, you are going to talk your wild nonsense again," I said hastily.

"Not I, silly little fool as I am, and full of whims and fancies; for your sake I'll talk like a sage. Were you ever at a ball?"

"No; how you do run on. What is it like? How charming it must be."

"I almost forget, it is years ago."

I laughed.

“You are not so old. Your first ball can hardly be forgotten yet.”

“I remember everything about it—with an effort. I see it all, as divers see what is going on above them, through a medium, dense, rippling, but transparent. There occurred that night what has confused the picture, and made its colours faint. I was all but assassinated in my bed, wounded here,” she touched her breast, “and never was the same since.”

“Were you near dying?”

“Yes, very—a cruel love—strange love, that would have taken my life. Love will have its sacrifices. No sacrifice without blood. Let us go to sleep now; I feel so lazy. How can I get up just now and lock my door?”

She was lying with her tiny hands buried in her rich wavy hair, under her cheek, her little head upon the pillow, and her glittering eyes followed me wherever I moved, with a kind of shy smile that I could not decipher.<sup>1</sup>

I bid her good-night, and crept from the room with an uncomfortable sensation.

I often wondered whether our pretty guest ever said her prayers. I certainly had never seen her upon her knees. In the morning she never came down until long after our family prayers were over, and at night she never left the drawing-room to attend our brief evening prayers in the hall.

If it had not been that it had casually come out in one of our careless talks that she had been baptised, I should have doubted her being a Christian. Religion was a subject on which I had never heard her speak a word. If I had known the world better, this particular neglect or antipathy would not have so much surprised me.

The precautions of nervous people are infectious, and persons of a like temperament are pretty sure, after a time, to imitate them. I had adopted Carmilla’s habit of locking her bed-room door, having taken into my head all her whimsical alarms about midnight invaders and prowling assassins. I had also adopted her precaution of making a brief search through her room, to satisfy herself that no lurking assassin or robber was “ensconced.”

1. Comma removed after “lying” in In a Glass Darkly.

These wise measures taken, I got into my bed and fell asleep.<sup>2</sup> A light was burning in my room. This was an old habit, of very early date, and which nothing could have tempted me to dispense with.

Thus fortified I might take my rest in peace. But dreams come through stone walls, light up dark rooms, or darken light ones, and their persons make their exits and their entrances as they please, and laugh at locksmiths.

I had a dream that night that was the beginning of a very strange agony.

I cannot call it a nightmare, for I was quite conscious of being asleep. But I was equally conscious of being in my room, and lying in bed, precisely as I actually was. I saw, or fancied I saw, the room and its furniture just as I had seen it last, except that it was very dark and I saw something moving round the foot of the bed, which at first I could not accurately distinguish. But I soon saw that it was a sooty-black animal that resembled a monstrous cat. It appeared to me about four or five feet long, for it measured fully the length of the hearth-rug as it passed over it; and it continued toing and froing with the lithe sinister restlessness of a beast in a cage. I could not cry out, although as you may suppose, I was terrified. Its pace was growing faster, and the room rapidly darker and darker, and at length so dark that I could no longer see anything of it but its eyes. I felt it spring lightly on the bed. The two broad eyes approached my face, and suddenly I felt a stinging pain as if two large needles darted, an inch or two apart, deep into my breast. I waked with a scream. The room was lighted by the candle that burnt there all through the night, and I saw a female figure standing at the foot of the bed, a little at the right side. It was in a dark loose dress, and its hair was down and covered its shoulders. A block of stone could not have been more still. There was not the slightest stir of respiration. As I stared at it the figure appeared to have changed its place, and was now nearer the door; then, close to it, the door opened, and it passed out.

2. Comma added after “taken” in In a Glass Darkly.

I was now relieved, and able to breathe and move. My first thought was that Carmilla had been playing me a trick, and that I had forgotten to secure my door. I hastened to it, and found it locked as usual on the inside. I was afraid to open it—I was horrified. I sprang into my bed and covered my head up in the bed-clothes, and lay there more dead than alive till morning.

VII

Descending

It would be vain my attempting to tell you the horror with which, even now, I recall the occurrence of that night. It was no such transitory terror as a dream leaves behind it. It seemed to deepen by time, and communicated itself to the room and the very furniture that had encompassed the apparition.

I could not bear next day to be alone for a moment. I should have told papa, but for two opposite reasons. At one time I thought he would laugh at my story, and I could not bear its being treated as a jest; and at another, I thought he might fancy that I had been attacked by the mysterious complaint which had invaded our neighborhood.<sup>1</sup> I had myself no misgivings of the kind, and as he had been rather an invalid<sup>2</sup> for some time, I was afraid of alarming him.

I was comfortable enough with my good-natured companions, Madame Paradon, and the vivacious Mademoiselle de Lafontaine.<sup>3</sup> They both perceived that I was out of spirits and nervous, and at length I told them what lay so heavy at my heart.

Mademoiselle laughed, but I fancied that Madame Paradon looked anxious.

1. Comma added after “another” in In a Glass Darkly.

2. As used here, meaning “a person prone to illness.”

3. Both the serialized version and In a Glass Darkly reflect this shift in chapter VII in the spelling of Madame Perrodon’s name and the change to lowercase “de” in “de Lafontaine.”

“By-the-bye,” said Mademoiselle, laughing, “the long lime-tree walk, behind Carmilla’s bedroom window, is haunted!”<sup>4</sup>

“Nonsense!” exclaimed Madame, who probably thought the theme rather inopportune, “and who tells that story, my dear?”

“Martin says that he came up twice, when the old yard gate was being repaired, before sunrise, and twice saw the same female figure walking down the lime-tree avenue.”<sup>5</sup>

“So he well might, as long as there are cows to milk in the river fields,” said Madame.

“I daresay; but Martin chooses to be frightened, and never did I see fool more frightened.”

“You must not say a word about it to Carmilla, because she can see down that walk from her room window,” I interposed, “and she is, if possible, a greater coward than I.”

Carmilla came down rather later than usual that day.

“I was so frightened last night,” she said, so soon as we were together, “and I am sure I should have seen something dreadful if it had not been for that charm I bought from the poor little hunchback whom I called such hard names. I had a dream of something black coming round my bed, and I awoke in a perfect horror, and I really thought, for some seconds, I saw a dark figure near the chimney-piece, but I felt under my pillow for my charm, and the moment my fingers touched it, the figure disappeared, and I felt quite certain, only that I had it by me, that something frightful would have made its appearance, and, perhaps, throttled me, as it did those poor people we heard of.”

“Well, listen to me,” I began, and recounted my adventure, at the recital of which she appeared horrified.

“And had you the charm near you?” she asked, earnestly.

“No, I had dropped it into a china vase in the drawing-room, but I shall certainly take it with me to-night, as you have so much faith in it.”

4. Hyphen removed in “bedroom window” in In a Glass Darkly. (I adopted this change.)

5. Hyphen in “yard gate” removed in In a Glass Darkly.

At this distance of time I cannot tell you, or even understand, how I overcame my horror so effectually as to lie alone in my room that night. I remember distinctly that I pinned the charm to my pillow. I fell asleep almost immediately, and slept even more soundly than usual all night.

Next night I passed as well. My sleep was delightfully deep and dreamless. But I awakened with a sense of lassitude and melancholy, which, however, did not exceed a degree that was almost luxurious.

"Well, I told you so," said Carmilla, when I described my quiet sleep, "I had such delightful sleep myself last night; I pinned the charm to the breast of my night-dress. It was too far away the night before. I am quite sure it was all fancy, except the dreams. I used to think that evil spirits made dreams, but our doctor told me it is no such thing. Only a fever passing by, or some other malady, as they often do, he said, knocks at the door, and not being able to get in, passes on, with that alarm."

"And what do you think the charm is?" said I.

"It has been fumigated or immersed in some drug, and is an antidote against the malaria," she answered.

"Then it acts only on the body?"

"Certainly; you don't suppose that evil spirits are frightened by bits of ribbon, or the perfumes of a druggist's shop? No, these complaints, wandering in the air, begin by trying the nerves, and so infect the brain, but before they can seize upon you, the antidote repels them. That I am sure is what the charm has done for us. It is nothing magical, it is simply natural."

I should have been happier if I could have quite agreed with Carmilla, but I did my best, and the impression was a little losing its force.

For some nights I slept profoundly; but still every morning I felt the same lassitude, and a languor weighed upon me all day. I felt myself a changed girl. A strange melancholy was stealing over me, a melancholy that I would not have interrupted. Dim thoughts of death began to open, and an idea that I was slowly sinking took gentle, and, somehow, not unwelcome, possession of me. If it was sad, the tone of mind which this induced was also sweet. Whatever it might be, my soul acquiesced in it.

I would not admit that I was ill, I would not consent to tell my papa, or to have the doctor sent for.

Carmilla became more devoted to me than ever, and her strange paroxysms of languid adoration more frequent. She used to gloat<sup>6</sup> on me with increasing ardour the more my strength and spirits waned. This always shocked me like a momentary glare of insanity.

With knowing it, I was now in a pretty advanced stage of the strangest illness under which mortal ever suffered. There was an unaccountable fascination in its earlier symptoms that more than reconciled me to the incapacitating effect of that stage of the malady. This fascination increased for a time, until it reached a certain point, when gradually a sense of the horrible mingled itself with it, deepening, as you shall hear, until it discoloured and perverted the whole state of my life.

The first change I experienced was rather agreeable. It was very near the turning-point from which began the descent of Avernus.<sup>7</sup>

Certain vague and strange sensations visited me in my sleep. The prevailing one was of that pleasant, peculiar cold thrill which we feel in bathing, when we move against the current of a river. This was soon accompanied by dreams that seemed interminable, and were so vague that I could never recollect their scenery and persons, or any one connected portion of their action. But they left an awful impression, and a sense of exhaustion, as if I had passed through a long period of great mental exertion and danger. After all these dreams there remained on waking a remembrance of having been in a place very nearly dark, and of having spoken to people whom I could not see; and especially of one clear voice, of a female's, very deep, that spoke as if at a distance, slowly, and producing always the same sensation of indescribable solemnity and fear. Sometimes there came a sensation as if a hand was drawn softly along my cheek and neck. Sometimes it was as if

6. As used here, meaning "to focus on greedily or jealously."

7. The entrance to the Underworld in Greek mythology, as discussed in Virgil's Aeneid, book 6.

warm lips kissed me, and longer and more lovingly as they reached my throat, but there the caress fixed itself. My heart beat faster, my breathing rose and fell rapidly and full drawn; a sobbing, that rose into a sense of strangulation, supervened, and turned into a dreadful convulsion, in which my senses left me and I became unconscious.

It was now three weeks since the commencement of this unaccountable state. My sufferings had, during the last week, told upon my appearance. I had grown pale, my eyes were dilated and darkened underneath, and the languor which I had long felt began to display itself in my countenance.

My father asked me often whether I was ill; but, with an obstinacy which now seems to me unaccountable, I persisted in assuring him that I was quite well.

In a sense this was true. I had no pain, I could complain of no bodily derangement. My complaint seemed to be one of the imagination, or the nerves, and, horrible as my sufferings were, I kept them, with a morbid reserve, very nearly to myself.

It could not be that terrible complaint which the peasants called the oupire, for I had now been suffering for three weeks, and they were seldom ill for much more than three days, when death put an end to their miseries.

Carmilla complained of dreams and feverish sensations, but by no means of so alarming a kind of as mine. I say that mine were extremely alarming. Had I been capable of comprehending my condition, I would have invoked aid and advice on my knees. The narcotic of an unsuspected influence was acting upon me, and my perceptions were benumbed.

I am going to tell you now of a dream that led immediately to an odd discovery.

One night, instead of the voice I was accustomed to hear in the dark, I heard one, sweet and tender, and at the same time terrible, which said, "Your mother warns you to beware of the assassin." At the same time a light unexpectedly sprang up, and I saw Carmilla, standing, near the foot of my bed, in her white night-dress, bathed, from her chin to her feet, in one great stain of blood.

2. Engraving of “Carmilla,” drawn by D. H. Friston, engraved by C. M. Jenkin. From The Dark Blue, Feb. 1872. Courtesy of the Special Collections/Research Center, Syracuse University Library.

I wakened with a shriek, possessed with the one idea that Carmilla was being murdered. I remember springing from my bed, and my next recollection is that of standing on the lobby,<sup>8</sup> crying for help.

Madame and Mademoiselle came scurrying out of their rooms in alarm; a lamp burned always on the lobby, and seeing me, they soon learned the cause of my terror.

8. In the hallway or foyer.

I insisted on our knocking at Carmilla's door. Our knocking was unanswered. It soon became a pounding and an uproar. We shrieked her name, but all was vain.

We all grew frightened, for the door was locked. We hurried back, in panic, to my room. There we rang the bell long and furiously. If my father's room had been at that side of the house, we would have called him up at once to our aid. But, alas! he was quite out of hearing, and to reach him involved an excursion for which we none of us had courage.

Servants, however, soon came running up the stairs; I had got on my dressing-gown and slippers meanwhile, and my companions were already similarly furnished. Recognising the voices of the servants on the lobby, we sallied out together; and having renewed, as fruitlessly, our summons at Carmilla's door, I ordered the men to force the lock. They did so, and we stood, holding our lights aloft, in the doorway, and so stared into the room.

We called her name; but there was still no reply. We looked round the room. Everything was undisturbed. It was exactly in the state in which I had left it on bidding her good night. But Carmilla was gone.

VIII

Search

At sight of the room, perfectly undisturbed except for our violent entrance, we began to cool a little, and soon recovered our senses sufficiently to dismiss the men. It had struck Mademoiselle that possibly Carmilla had been wakened by the uproar at her door, and in her first panic had jumped from her bed, and hid herself in a press,<sup>1</sup> or behind a curtain, from which she could not, of course, emerge until the majordomo and his myrmidons<sup>2</sup> had withdrawn. We now recommenced our search, and began to call her by name again.

It was all to no purpose. Our perplexity and agitation increased. We examined the windows, but they were secured. I implored of Carmilla, if she had concealed herself, to play this cruel trick no longer—to come out, and to end our anxieties. It was all useless. I was by this time convinced that she was not in the room, nor in the dressing-room, the door of which was still locked on this side. She could not have passed it. I was utterly puzzled. Had Carmilla discovered one of those secret passages which the old housekeeper said were known to exist in the schloss, although the tradition of their exact situation had been lost. A little time would, no doubt, explain all—utterly perplexed as, for the present, we were.

1. A large shuttered cabinet able to store clothes and large enough for a person.

2. “In translations of Homer (Iliad 2. 684) or with reference to the Homeric story: a member of a warlike people inhabiting ancient Thessaly, whom Achilles led to the siege of Troy” (OED).

It was past four o'clock, and I preferred passing the remaining hours of darkness in Madame's room. Daylight brought no solution of the difficulty.

The whole household, with my father at its head, was in a state of agitation next morning. Every part of the chateau was searched. The grounds were explored. Not a trace of the missing lady could be discovered. The stream was about to be dragged; my father was in distraction; what a tale to have to tell the poor girl's mother on her return. I, too, was almost beside myself, though my grief was quite of a different kind.

The morning was passed in alarm and excitement. It was now one o'clock, and still no tidings. I ran up to Carmilla's room, and found her standing at her dressing-table. I was astounded. I could not believe my eyes. She beckoned me to her with her pretty finger, in silence. Her face expressed extreme fear.

I ran to her in ecstasy of joy; I kissed and embraced her again and again. I ran to the bell and rang it vehemently, to bring others to the spot, who might at once relieve my father's anxiety.

"Dear Carmilla, what has become of you all this time? We have been in agonies of anxiety about you," I exclaimed. "Where have you been? How did you come back?"

"Last night has been a night of wonders," she said.

"For mercy's sake, explain all you can."

"It was past two last night," she said, "when I went to sleep as usual in my bed, with my doors locked, that of the dressing-room, and that opening upon the gallery.<sup>3</sup> My sleep was uninterrupted, and, so far as I know, dreamless; but I awoke just now on the sofa in the dressing-room there, and I found the door between the rooms open, and the other door forced. How could all this have happened without my being wakened? It must have been accompanied with a great deal of noise and I am particularly easily wakened; and how could I have been carried out of my bed without my sleep having been interrupted, I whom the slightest stir startles?"

3. Comma added after "night" in In a Glass Darkly.

By this time, Madame, Mademoiselle, my father, and a number of the servants were in the room. Carmilla was, of course, overwhelmed with enquiries, congratulations, and welcomes. She had but one story to tell, and seemed the least able of all the party to suggest any way of accounting for what had happened.

My father took a turn up and down the room, thinking. I saw Carmilla's eye follow him for a moment with a sly, dark glance.

When my father had sent the servants away, Mademoiselle having gone in search of a little bottle of valerian and sal-volatile,<sup>4</sup> and there being no one now in the room with Carmilla, except my father, Madame, and myself, he came to her thoughtfully, took her hand very kindly, led her to the sofa, and sat down beside her.

"Will you forgive me, my dear, if I risk a conjecture, and ask a question?"

"Who can have a better right?" she said. "Ask what you please, and I will tell you everything. But my story is simply one of bewilderment and darkness. I know absolutely nothing. Put any question you please. But you know, of course, the limitations mamma has placed me under?"

"Perfectly, my dear child. I need not approach the topics on which she desires our silence. Now, the marvel of last night consists in your having been removed from your bed and your room, without being wakened, and this removal<sup>5</sup> having occurred apparently while the windows were still secured, and the two doors locked upon the inside. I will tell you my theory, and first ask you a question."

Carmilla was leaning on her hand dejectedly; Madame and I were listening breathlessly.

"Now, my question is this. Have you ever been suspected of walking in your sleep?"

"Never, since I was very young indeed."

4. Valerian is an herb and sal-volatile a solution used to awaken people from fainting spells, like smelling salts.

5. The spelling "removal's" was changed to "removal" in In a Glass Darkly.

“But you did walk in your sleep when you were young?”

“Yes; I know I did. I have been told so often by my old nurse.” My father smiled and nodded.

“Well, what has happened is this. You got up in your sleep, unlocked the door, not leaving the key, as usual, in the lock, but taking it out and locking it on the outside; you again took the key out, and carried it away with you to some one of the five-and-twenty rooms on this floor, or perhaps up-stairs or down-stairs. There are so many rooms and closets, so much heavy furniture, and such accumulations of lumber,<sup>6</sup> that it would require a week to search this old house thoroughly. Do you see, now, what I mean?”

“I do, but not all,” she answered.

“And how, papa, do you account for her finding herself on the sofa in the dressing-room, which we had searched so carefully?”

“She came there after you had searched it, still in her sleep, and at last awoke spontaneously, and was as much surprised to find herself where she was as any one else. I wish all mysteries were as easily and innocently explained as yours, Carmilla,” he said, laughing. “And so we may congratulate ourselves on the certainty that the most natural explanation of the occurrence is one that involves no drugging, no tampering with locks, no burglars, or poisoners, or witches—nothing that need alarm Carmilla, or any one else, for our safety.”

Carmilla was looking charmingly. Nothing could be more beautiful than her tints.<sup>7</sup> Her beauty was, I think, enhanced by that graceful languor that was peculiar to her. I think my father was silently contrasting her looks with mine, for he said:

“I wish my poor Laura was looking more like herself”; and he sighed.

So our alarms were happily ended, and Carmilla restored to her friends.

6. Unused, presumably wooden furniture.

7. Shadings of skin tone, coloring.

IX

The Doctor

As Carmilla would not hear of an attendant sleeping in her room, my father arranged that a servant should sleep outside her door, so that she could not attempt to make another such excursion without being arrested at her own door.

That night passed quietly; and next morning early, the doctor, whom my father had sent for without telling me a word about it, arrived to see me.

Madame accompanied me to the library; and there the grave little doctor, with white hair and spectacles, whom I mentioned before, was waiting to receive me.

I told him my story, and as I proceeded he grew graver and graver.

We were standing, he and I, in the recess of one of the windows, facing one another. When my statement was over, he leaned with his shoulders against the wall, and with his eyes fixed on me earnestly, with an interest in which was a dash of horror.

After a minute's reflection, he asked Madame if he could see my father.

He was sent for accordingly, and as he entered, smiling, he said, "I dare say, doctor, you are going to tell me that I am an old fool for having brought you here; I hope I am."

But his smile faded into shadow as the doctor, with a very grave face, beckoned him to him.

He and the doctor talked for some time in the same recess where I had just conferred with the physician. It seemed an earnest and argumentative conversation. The room is very large, and I and Madame stood together, burning with curiosity, at the further end. Not a word could we hear, however, for they spoke in a very low tone, and the deep recess of the window quite concealed the doctor from view, and very nearly my father, whose foot, arm, and shoulder only could we see; and the voices were, I suppose, all the less audible for the sort of closet which the thick wall and window formed.

After a time my father's face looked into the room; it was pale, thoughtful, and, I fancied, agitated.

"Laura, dear, come here for a moment. Madame, we shan't trouble you, the doctor says, at present."

Accordingly I approached, for the first time a little alarmed; for, although I felt very weak, I did not feel ill; and strength, one always fancies, is a thing that may be picked up when we please.

My father held out his hand to me, as I drew near, but he was looking at the doctor, and he said:

"It certainly is very odd; I don't understand it quite. Laura, come here, dear; now attend to Doctor Spielsberg, and recollect yourself."

"You mentioned a sensation like that of two needles piercing the skin; somewhere about your neck, on the night when you experienced your first horrible dream. Is there still any soreness?"

"None at all," I answered.

"Can you indicate with your finger about the point at which you think this occurred?"

"Very little below my throat—here," I answered.

I wore a morning dress, which covered the place I pointed to.

"Now you can satisfy yourself," said the doctor. "You won't mind your papa's lowering your dress a very little. It is necessary, to detect a symptom of the complaint under which you have been suffering."

I acquiesced. It was only an inch or two below the edge of my collar.

"God bless me!—so it is," exclaimed my father, growing pale.

"You see it now with your own eyes," said the doctor, with a gloomy triumph.

"What is it?" I exclaimed, beginning to be frightened.

“Nothing, my dear young lady, but a small blue spot, about the size of the tip of your little finger; and now,” he continued, turning to papa, “the question is what is best to be done?”

“Is there any danger?” I urged, in great trepidation.

“I trust not, my dear,” answered the doctor. “I don’t see why you should not recover. I don’t see why you should not begin immediately to get better. That is the point at which the sense of strangulation begins?”

“Yes,” I answered.

“And—recollect as well as you can—the same point was a kind of centre of that thrill which you described just now, like the current of a cold stream running against you?”

“It may have been; I think it was.”

“Ay, you see?” he added, turning to my father. “Shall I say a word to Madame?”

“Certainly,” said my father.

He called Madame to him, and said:

“I find my young friend here far from well. It won’t be of any great consequence, I hope; but it will be necessary that some steps be taken, which I will explain by-and-bye; but in the meantime, Madame, you will be so good as not to let Miss Laura be alone for one moment. That is the only direction I need give for the present. It is indispensable.”

“We may rely upon your kindness, Madame, I know,” added my father.

Madame satisfied him eagerly.

“And you, dear Laura, I know you will observe the doctor’s direction.”

“I shall have to ask your opinion upon another patient, whose symptoms slightly resemble those of my daughter, that have just been detailed to you—very much milder in degree, but I believe quite of the same sort. She is a young lady—our guest; but as you say you will be passing this way again this evening, you can’t do better than take your supper here, and you can then see her. She does not come down till the afternoon.”

"I thank you," said the doctor. "I shall be with you, then, at about seven this evening."

And then they repeated their directions to me and to Madame, and with this parting charge my father left us, and walked out with the doctor; and I saw them pacing together up and down between the road and the moat, on the grassy platform in front of the castle, evidently absorbed in earnest conversation.

The doctor did not return. I saw him mount his horse there, take his leave, and ride away eastward through the forest.

Nearly at the same time I saw the man arrive from Dranfeld with the letters, and dismount and hand the bag to my father.

In the meantime, Madame and I were both busy, lost in conjecture as to the reasons of the singular and earnest direction which the doctor and my father had concurred in imposing. Madame, as she afterwards told me, was afraid the doctor apprehended a sudden seizure, and that, without prompt assistance, I might either lose my life in a fit, or at least be seriously hurt. This interpretation did not strike me; and I fancied, perhaps luckily for my nerves, that the arrangement was prescribed simply to secure a companion, who would prevent my taking too much exercise, or eating unripe fruit, or doing any of the fifty foolish things to which young people are supposed to be prone.

About half-an-hour after my father came in—he had a letter in his hand—and said:

"This letter has been delayed; it is from General Spielsdorf. He might have been here yesterday, he may not come till to-morrow, or he may be here to-day." He put the open letter into my hand; but he did not look pleased, as he used when a guest, especially one so much loved as the General, was coming. On the contrary, he looked as if he wished him at the bottom of the Red Sea. There was plainly something on his mind which he did not choose to divulge.

"Papa, darling, will you tell me this?" said I, suddenly laying my hand on his arm, and looking, I am sure, imploringly in his face.

"Perhaps," he answered, smoothing my hair caressingly over my eyes.

"Does the doctor think me very ill?"

“No, dear; he thinks, if right steps are taken, you will be quite well again, at least, on the high road to a complete recovery, in a day or two,” he answered, a little drily. “I wish our good friend, the General, had chosen any other time; that is, I wish you had been perfectly well to receive him.”

“But do tell me, papa,” I insisted, “what does he think is the matter with me?”

“Nothing; you must not plague me with questions,” he answered, with more irritation than I ever remember him to have displayed before; and seeing that I looked wounded, I suppose, he kissed me, and added, “You shall know all about it in a day or two; that is, all that I know. In the meantime you are not to trouble your head about it.”

He turned and left the room, but came back before I had done wondering and puzzling over the oddity of all this; it was merely to say that he was going to Karnstein, and had ordered the carriage to be ready at twelve, and that I and Madame should accompany him; he was going to see the priest who lived near those picturesque grounds, upon business, and as Carmilla had never seen them, she could follow, when she came down, with Mademoiselle, who would bring materials for what you call a pic-nic, which might be laid for us in the ruined castle.

At twelve o’clock, accordingly, I was ready, and not long after my father, Madame, and I set out upon our projected drive.

Passing the drawbridge we turn to the right, and follow the road over the steep gothic bridge, westward, to reach the deserted village and ruined castle of Karnstein. No sylvan drive can be fancied prettier. The ground breaks into gentle hills and hollows, all clothed with beautiful wood, totally destitute of the comparative formality which artificial planting and early culture and pruning impart.

The irregularities of the ground often lead the road out of its course, and cause it to wind beautifully round the sides of broken hollows and the steeper sides of the hills, among varieties of ground almost inexhaustible.

Turning one of these points, we suddenly encountered our old friend, the old General, riding towards us, attended by a mounted servant.<sup>1</sup> His portmanteaus were following in a hired waggon, such as we term a cart.

The General dismounted as we pulled up, and, after the usual greetings, was easily persuaded to accept the vacant seat in the carriage, and send his horse on with his servant to the schloss.

1. The phrase “our old friend” was added in In a Glass Darkly.

X

Bereaved

It was about ten months since we had last seen him; but that time had sufficed to make an alteration of years in his appearance. He had grown thinner; something of gloom and anxiety had taken the place of that cordial serenity which used to characterise his features. His dark blue eyes, always penetrating, now gleamed with a sterner light from under his shaggy grey eyebrows. It was not such a change as grief alone usually induces, and angrier passions seemed to have had their share in bringing it about.

We had not long resumed our drive, when the General began to talk, with his usual soldierly directness, of the bereavement, as he termed it, which he had sustained in the death of his beloved niece and ward; and he then broke out in a tone of intense bitterness and fury, inveighing against the “hellish arts” to which she had fallen a victim, and expressing, with more exasperation than piety, his wonder that Heaven should tolerate so monstrous an indulgence of the lusts and malignity of hell.

My father, who saw at once that something very extraordinary had befallen, asked him, if not too painful to him, to detail the circumstances which he thought justified the strong terms in which he expressed himself.

“I should tell you all with pleasure,” said the General, “but you would not believe me.”

“Why should I not?” he asked.

“Because,” he answered testily, “you believe in nothing but what consists with your own prejudices and illusions. I remember when I was like you, but I have learned better.”

“Try me,” said my father; “I am not such a dogmatist as you suppose. Besides which, I very well know that you generally require proof for what you believe, and am, therefore, very strongly pre-disposed to respect your conclusions.”

“You are right in supposing that I have not been led lightly into a belief in the marvellous—for what I have experienced is marvellous—and I have been forced by extraordinary evidence to credit that which ran counter, diametrically, to all my theories. I have been made the dupe of a preternatural conspiracy.”

Notwithstanding his professions of confidence in the General’s penetration, I saw my father, at this point, glance at the General, with, as I thought, a marked suspicion of his sanity.

The General did not see it, luckily. He was looking gloomily and curiously into the glades and vistas of the woods that were opening before us.

“You are going to the Ruins of Karnstein?” he said. “Yes, it is a lucky coincidence; do you know I was going to ask you to bring me there to inspect them. I have a special object in exploring. There is a ruined chapel, ain’t there, with a great many tombs of that extinct family?”<sup>1</sup>

“So there are—highly interesting,” said my father. “I hope you are thinking of claiming the title and estates?”

My father said this gaily, but the General did not recollect the laugh, or even the smile, which courtesy exacts for a friend’s joke; on the contrary, he looked grave and even fierce, ruminating on a matter that stirred his anger and horror.

“Something very different,” he said, gruffly. “I mean to unearth some of those fine people. I hope, by God’s blessing, to accomplish a pious sacrilege here, which will relieve our earth of certain monsters,

1. Apostrophe in “ain’t” added in In a Glass Darkly.

and enable honest people to sleep in their beds without being assailed by murderers. I have strange things to tell you, my dear friend, such as I myself would have scouted as incredible a few months since."

My father looked at him again, but this time not with a glance of suspicion—with an eye, rather, of keen intelligence and alarm.

"The house of Karnstein," he said, "has been long extinct: a hundred years at least. My dear wife was maternally descended from the Karnsteins. But the name and title have long ceased to exist. The castle is a ruin; the very village is deserted; it is fifty years since the smoke of a chimney was seen there; not a roof left."

"Quite true. I have heard a great deal about that since I last saw you; a great deal that will astonish you. But I had better relate everything in the order in which it occurred," said the General. "You saw my dear ward—my child, I may call her. No creature could have been more beautiful, and only three months ago none more blooming."

"Yes, poor thing! when I saw her last she certainly was quite lovely," said my father. "I was grieved and shocked more than I can tell you, my dear friend; I knew what a blow it was to you."

He took the General's hand, and they exchanged a kind pressure. Tears gathered in the old soldier's eyes. He did not seek to conceal them. He said:

"We have been very old friends; I knew you would feel for me, childless as I am. She had become an object of very near interest to me, and repaid my care by an affection that cheered my home and made my life happy. That is all gone. The years that remain to me on earth may not be very long; but by God's mercy I hope to accomplish a service to mankind before I die, and to subserve the vengeance of Heaven upon the fiends who have murdered my poor child in the spring of her hopes and beauty!"

"You said, just now, that you intended relating everything as it occurred," said my father. "Pray do; I assure you that it is not mere curiosity that prompts me."

By this time we had reached the point at which the Drunshall road, by which the General had come, diverges from the road which we were travelling to Karnstein.

“How far is it to the ruins?” inquired the General, looking anxiously forward.<sup>2</sup>

“About half a league,” answered my father. “Pray let us hear the story you were so good to promise.”

2. The original “enquired” changed to “inquired” in In a Glass Darkly.

XI

The Story

“With all my heart,” said the General, with an effort; and after a short pause in which to arrange his subject, he commenced one of the strangest narratives I had ever heard.

“My dear child was looking forward with great pleasure to the visit you had been so good as to arrange for her to your charming daughter.” Here he made me a gallant but melancholy bow. “In the meantime we had an invitation to my old friend the Count Carlsfeld, whose schloss is about six leagues to the other side of Karnstein. It was to attend the series of fêtes which, you remember, were given by him in honour of his illustrious visitor, the Grand Duke Charles.”

“Yes; and very splendid, I believe, they were,” said my father.

“Princely! But then his hospitalities are quite regal. He has Aladdin’s lamp.<sup>1</sup> The night from which my sorrow dates was devoted to a magnificent masquerade. The grounds were thrown open, the trees hung with coloured lamps. There was such a display of fireworks as Paris itself has never witnessed. And such music—music, you know, is my weakness—such ravishing music! The finest instrumental band, perhaps, in the world, and the finest singers who could be collected from all the great operas in Europe. As you wandered through these fantastically illuminated grounds, the moon-lighted chateau throwing

3. Reference to a lamp that contained a genie who could grant wishes to the lamp’s holder. The implication is that the count is an excellent host.

a rosy light from its long rows of windows, you would suddenly hear these ravishing voices stealing from the silence of some grove, or rising from boats upon the lake. I felt myself, as I looked and listened, carried back into the romance and poetry of my early youth.

“When the fireworks were ended, and the ball beginning, we returned to the noble suite of rooms that were thrown open to the dancers. A masked ball, you know, is a beautiful sight; but so brilliant a spectacle of the kind I never saw before.

“It was a very aristocratic assembly. I was myself almost the only ‘nobody’ present.

“My dear child was looking quite beautiful. She wore no mask. Her excitement and delight added an unspeakable charm to her features, always lovely. I remarked a young lady, dressed magnificently, but wearing a mask, who appeared to me to be observing my ward with extraordinary interest. I had seen her, earlier in the evening, in the great hall, and again, for a few minutes, walking near us, on the terrace under the castle windows, similarly employed. A lady, also masked, richly and gravely dressed, and with a stately air, like a person of rank, accompanied her as a chaperon. Had the young lady not worn a mask, I could, of course, have been much more certain upon the question whether she was really watching my poor darling. I am now well assured that she was.

“We were now in one of the salons. My poor dear child had been dancing, and was resting a little in one of the chairs near the door; I was standing near. The two ladies I have mentioned had approached, and the younger took the chair next my ward; while her companion stood beside me, and for a little time addressed herself, in a low tone, to her charge.

Availing herself of the privilege of her mask, she turned to me, and in the tone of an old friend, and calling me by my name, opened a conversation with me, which piqued my curiosity a good deal. She referred to many scenes where she had met me—at Court, and at distinguished houses. She alluded to little incidents which I had long ceased to think of, but which, I found, had only lain in abeyance in my memory, for they instantly started into life at her touch.

“I became more and more curious to ascertain who she was, every moment. She parried my attempts to discover very adroitly and pleasantly. The knowledge she showed of many passages in my life seemed to me all but unaccountable; and she appeared to take a not unnatural pleasure in foiling my curiosity, and in seeing me flounder, in my eager perplexity, from one conjecture to another.

“In the meantime the young lady, whom her mother called by the odd name of Millarca, when she once or twice addressed her, had, with the same ease and grace, got into conversation with my ward.

“She introduced herself by saying that her mother was a very old acquaintance of mine. She spoke of the agreeable audacity which a mask rendered practicable; she talked like a friend; she admired her dress, and insinuated very prettily her admiration of her beauty. She amused her with laughing criticisms upon the people who crowded the ball-room, and laughed at my poor child’s fun. She was very witty and lively when she pleased, and after a time they had grown very good friends, and the young stranger lowered her mask, displaying a remarkably beautiful face. I had never seen it before, neither had my dear child. But though it was new to us, the features were so engaging, as well as lovely, that it was impossible not to feel the attraction powerfully. My poor girl did so. I never saw anyone more taken with another at first sight, unless, indeed, it was the stranger herself, who seemed quite to have lost her heart to her.

“In the meantime, availing myself of the licence of a masquerade, I put not a few questions to the elder lady.

“‘You have puzzled me utterly,’ I said, laughing. ‘Is that not enough? won’t you, now, consent to stand on equal terms, and do me the kindness to remove your mask?’

“‘Can any request be more unreasonable?’ she replied. ‘Ask a lady to yield an advantage! Beside, how do you know you should recognise me? Years make changes.’

“‘As you see,’ I said, with a bow, and, I suppose, a rather melancholy little laugh.

“‘As philosophers tell us,’ she said; ‘and how do you know that a sight of my face would help you?’

“‘I should take chance for that,’ I answered. ‘It is vain trying to make yourself out an old woman; your figure betrays you.’

“‘Years, nevertheless, have passed since I saw you, rather since you saw me, for that is what I am considering. Millarca, there, is my daughter; I cannot then be young, even in the opinion of people whom time has taught to be indulgent, and I may not like to be compared with what you remember me. You have no mask to remove. You can offer me nothing in exchange.’

“‘My petition is to your pity, to remove it.’

“‘And mine to yours, to let it stay where it is,’ she replied.

“‘Well, then, at least you will tell me whether you are French or German; you speak both languages so perfectly.’

“‘I don’t think I shall tell you that, General; you intend a surprise, and are meditating the particular point of attack.’

“‘At all events, you won’t deny this,’ I said, ‘that being honoured by your permission to converse, I ought to know how to address you. Shall I say Madame la Comtesse?’

“She laughed, and she would, no doubt, have met me with another evasion—if, indeed, I can treat any occurrence in an interview every circumstance of which was pre-arranged, as I now believe, with the profoundest cunning, as liable to be modified by accident.

“‘As to that,’ she began; but she was interrupted, almost as she opened her lips, by a gentleman, dressed in black, who looked particularly elegant and distinguished, with this drawback, that his face was the most deadly pale I ever saw, except in death. He was in no masquerade—in the plain evening dress of a gentleman; and he said, without a smile, but with a courtly and unusually low bow:—

“‘Will Madame the Countess permit me to say a very few words which may interest her?’

“The lady turned quickly to him, and touched her lip in token of silence; she then said to me, ‘Keep my place for me, General; I shall return when I have said a few words.’

“And with this injunction, playfully given, she walked a little aside with the gentleman in black, and talked for some minutes, apparently very earnestly. They then walked away slowly together in the crowd, and I lost them for some minutes.

“I spent the interval in cudgelling my brains for a conjecture as to the identity of the lady who seemed to remember me so kindly, and I was thinking of turning about and joining in the conversation between my pretty ward and the Countess’s daughter, and trying whether, by the time she returned, I might not have a surprise in store for her, by having her name, title, chateau, and estates at my fingers’ ends. But at this moment she returned, accompanied by the pale man in black, who said:

“‘I shall return and inform Madame la Comtesse when her carriage is at the door.’

“He withdrew with a bow.

XII

A Petition

“‘Then we are to lose Madame the Countess, but I hope only for a few hours,’ I said, with a low bow.

“‘It may be that only, or it may be a few weeks. It was very unlucky his speaking to me just now as he did. Do you now know me?’

“‘I assured her I did not.

“‘You shall know me,’ she said, ‘but not at present. We are older and better friends than, perhaps, you suspect. I cannot yet declare myself. I shall in three weeks pass your beautiful schloss, about which I have been making enquiries. I shall then look in upon you for an hour or two, and renew a friendship which I never think of without a thousand pleasant recollections. This moment a piece of news has reached me like a thunderbolt. I must set out now, and travel by a devious route, nearly a hundred miles, with all the dispatch I can possibly make. My perplexities multiply. I am only deterred by the compulsory reserve I practise as to my name from making a very singular request of you. My poor child has not quite recovered her strength. Her horse fell with her, at a hunt which she had ridden out to witness, her nerves have not yet recovered the shock, and our physician says that she must on no account exert herself for some time to come. We came here, in consequence, by very easy stages—hardly six leagues a day. I must now travel day and night, on a mission of life and death—a mission the critical and momentous nature of which I shall be able to explain to you when we meet, as I hope we shall, in a few weeks, without the necessity of any concealment.’

“She went on to make her petition, and it was in the tone of a person from whom such a request amounted to conferring, rather than seeking a favor. This was only in manner, and, as it seemed, quite unconsciously. Than the terms in which it was expressed, nothing could be more deprecatory. It was simply that I would consent to take charge of her daughter during her absence.

“This was, all things considered, a strange, not to say, an audacious request. She in some sort disarmed me, by stating and admitting everything that could be urged against it, and throwing herself entirely upon my chivalry. At the same moment, by a fatality that seems to have predetermined all that happened, my poor child came to my side, and, in an undertone, besought me to invite her new friend, Millarca, to pay us a visit. She had just been sounding her, and thought, if her mamma would allow her, she would like it extremely.

“At another time I should have told her to wait a little, until at least, we knew who they were. But I had not a moment to think in. The two ladies assailed me together, and I must confess the refined and beautiful face of the young lady, about which there was something extremely engaging, as well as the elegance and fire of high birth, determined me; and, quite overpowered, I submitted, and undertook, too easily, the care of the young lady, whom her mother called Millarca.

“The Countess beckoned to her daughter, who listened with grave attention while she told her, in general terms, how suddenly and peremptorily she had been summoned, and also of the arrangement she had made for her under my care, adding that I was one of her earliest and most valued friends.

“I made, of course, such speeches as the case seemed to call for, and found myself, on reflection, in a position which I did not half like.

“The gentleman in black returned, and very ceremoniously conducted the lady from the room.

“The demeanour of this gentleman was such as to impress me with the conviction that the Countess was a lady of very much more importance than her modest title alone might have led me to assume.

“Her last charge to me was that no attempt was to be made to learn more about her than I might have already guessed, until her return. Our distinguished host, whose guest she was, knew her reasons. 'But here,' she said, 'neither I nor my daughter could safely remain for more than a day. I removed my mask imprudently for a moment, about an hour ago, and, too late, I fancied you saw me. So I resolved to seek an opportunity of talking a little to you. Had I found that you had seen me, I should have thrown myself on your high sense of honour to keep my secret for some weeks. As it is, I am satisfied that you did not see me; but if you now suspect, or, on reflection, should suspect, who I am, I commit myself, in like manner, entirely to your honour. My daughter will observe the same secresy, and I well know that you will, from time to time, remind her, lest she should thoughtlessly disclose it.'

"She whispered a few words to her daughter, kissed her hurriedly twice, and went away, accompanied by the pale gentleman in black, and disappeared in the crowd."

"'In the next room,' said Millarca, 'there is a window that looks upon the hall-door. I should like to see the last of mamma, and to kiss my hand to her.'

"We assented, of course, and accompanied her to the window. We looked out, and saw a handsome old-fashioned carriage, with a troop of couriers and footmen. We saw the slim figure of the pale gentleman in black, as he held a thick velvet cloak, and placed it about her shoulders and threw the hood over her head. She nodded to him, and just touched his hand with hers. He bowed low repeatedly as the door closed, and the carriage began to move.

"'She is gone,' said Millarca, with a sigh.

"'She is gone,' I repeated to myself, for the first time—in the hurried moments that had elapsed since my consent—reflecting upon the folly of my act.

"'She did not look up,' said the young lady, plaintively.

"'The Countess had taken off her mask, perhaps, and did not care to show her face,' I said; 'and she could not know that you were in the window.'

"She sighed, and looked in my face. She was so beautiful that I relented. I was sorry I had for a moment repented of my hospitality, and I determined to make her amends for the unavowed churlishness of my reception.

“The young lady, replacing her mask, joined my ward in persuading me to return to the grounds, where the concert was soon to be renewed. We did so, and walked up and down the terrace that lies under the castle windows. Millarca became very intimate with us, and amused us with lively descriptions and stories of most of the great people whom we saw upon the terrace. I liked her more and more every minute. Her gossip, without being ill-natured, was extremely diverting to me, who had been so long out of the great world. I thought what life she would give to our sometimes lonely evenings at home.

“This ball was not over until the morning sun had almost reached the horizon. It pleased the Grand Duke to dance till then, so loyal people could not go away, or think of bed.

“We had just got through a crowded saloon,<sup>1</sup> when my ward asked me what had become of Millarca. I thought she had been by her side, and she fancied she was by mine. The fact was, we had lost her.

“All my efforts to find her were vain. I feared that she had mistaken, in the confusion of a momentary separation from us, other people for her new friends, and had, possibly, pursued and lost them in the extensive grounds which were thrown open to us.

“Now, in its full force, I recognised a new folly in my having undertaken the charge of a young lady without so much as knowing her name; and fettered as I was by promises, of the reasons for imposing which I knew nothing, I could not even point my inquiries<sup>2</sup> by saying that the missing young lady was the daughter of the Countess who had taken her departure a few hours before.

“Morning broke. It was clear daylight before I gave up my search. It was not till near two o’clock next day that we heard anything of my missing charge.

1. Alternate spelling of salon; a room for hosting guests.

2. This is the only time this word is spelled inquiries instead of enquiries, another textual inconsistency possibly reflective of the text being written serially.

“At about that time a servant knocked at my niece’s door, to say that he had been earnestly requested by a young lady, who appeared to be in great distress, to make out where she could find the General Baron Spielsdorf and the young lady his daughter, in whose charge she had been left by her mother.

“There could be no doubt, notwithstanding the slight inaccuracy, that our young friend had turned up; and so she had. Would to heaven we had lost her!

“She told my poor child a story to account for her having failed to recover us for so long. Very late, she said, she had got to the house-keeper’s bedroom in despair of finding us, and had then fallen into a deep sleep which, long as it was, had hardly sufficed to recruit her strength after the fatigues of the ball.

“That day Millarca came home with us. I was only too happy, after all, to have secured so charming a companion for my dear girl.

XIII

The Wood-Man

“There soon, however, appeared some drawbacks. In the first place, Millarca complained of extreme languor—the weakness that remained after her late illness—and she never emerged from her room till the afternoon was pretty far advanced. In the next place, it was accidentally discovered, although she always locked her door on the inside, and never disturbed the key from its place till she admitted the maid to assist at her toilet,<sup>1</sup> that she was undoubtedly sometimes absent from her room in the very early morning, and at various times later in the day, before she wished it to be understood that she was stirring. She was repeatedly seen from the windows of the schloss, in the first faint grey of the morning, walking through the trees, in an easterly direction, and looking like a person in a trance. This convinced me that she walked in her sleep. But this hypothesis did not solve the puzzle. How did she pass out from her room, leaving the door locked on the inside? How did she escape from the house without unbarring door or window?

“In the midst of my perplexities, an anxiety of a far more urgent kind presented itself.

“My dear child began to lose her looks and health, and that in a manner so mysterious, and even horrible, that I became thoroughly frightened.

3. Daily ablutions; a person’s morning rituals and preparations to be presentable in public.

“She was at first visited by appalling dreams; then, as she fancied, by a spectre, sometimes resembling Millarca, sometimes in the shape of a beast, indistinctly seen, walking round the foot of her bed, from side to side. Lastly came sensations. One, not unpleasant, but very peculiar, she said, resembled the flow of an icy stream against her breast. At a later time, she felt something like a pair of large needles pierce her, a little below the throat, with a very sharp pain. A few nights after, followed a gradual and convulsive sense of strangulation; then came unconsciousness.”

I could hear distinctly every word the kind old General was saying, because by this time we were driving upon the short grass that spreads on either side of the road as you approach the roofless village which had not shown the smoke of a chimney for more than half a century.

You may guess how strangely I felt as I heard my own symptoms so exactly described in those which had been experienced by the poor girl who, but for the catastrophe which followed, would have been at that moment a visitor at my father’s chateau. You may suppose, also, how I felt as I heard him detail habits and mysterious peculiarities which were, in fact, those of our beautiful guest, Carmilla!

A vista opened in the forest; we were on a sudden under the chimneys and gables of the ruined village, and the towers and battlements of the dismantled castle, round which gigantic trees are grouped, overhung us from a slight eminence.

In a frightened dream I got down from the carriage, and in silence, for we had each abundant matter for thinking; we soon mounted the ascent, and were among the spacious chambers, winding stairs, and dark corridors of the castle.

“And this was once the palatial residence of the Karnsteins!” said the old General at length, as from a great window he looked out across the village, and saw the wide, undulating expanse of forest. “It was a bad family, and here its blood-stained annals were written,” he continued. “It is hard that they should, after death, continue to plague the human race with their atrocious lusts. That is the chapel of the Karnsteins, down there.”

He pointed down to the grey walls of the gothic building, partly visible through the foliage, a little way down the steep. "And I hear the axe of a woodman," he added, "busy among the trees that surround it; he possibly may give us the information of which I am in search, and point out the grave of Mircalla, Countess of Karnstein. These rustics preserve the local traditions of great families, whose stories die out among the rich and titled so soon as the families themselves become extinct."

"We have a portrait, at home, of Mircalla, the Countess Karnstein; should you like to see it?" asked my father.

"Time enough, dear friend," replied the General. "I believe that I have seen the original; and one motive which has led me to you earlier than I at first intended, was to explore the chapel which we are now approaching."

"What! See the Countess Mircalla," exclaimed my father; "why, she has been dead more than a century!"

"Not so dead as you fancy, I am told," answered the General.

"I confess, General, you puzzle me utterly," replied my father, looking at him, I fancied, for a moment with a return of the suspicion I detected before. But although there was anger and detestation, at times, in the old General's manner, there was nothing flighty.

"There remains to me," he said, as we passed under the heavy arch of the gothic church—for its dimensions would have justified its being so styled—"but one object which can interest me during the few years that remain to me on earth, and that is to wreak on her the vengeance which, I thank God, may still be accomplished by a mortal arm."

"What vengeance can you mean?" asked my father, in increasing amazement.

"I mean, to decapitate the monster," he answered, with a fierce flush, and a stamp that echoed mournfully through the hollow ruin, and his clenched hand was at the same moment raised, as if it grasped the handle of an axe, while he shook it ferociously in the air.

"What?" exclaimed my father, more than ever bewildered.

"To strike her head off."

"Cut her head off!"

“Aye, with a hatchet, with a spade, or with anything that can cleave through her murderous throat. You shall hear,” he answered, trembling with rage. And hurrying forward he said:

“That beam will answer for a seat; your dear child is fatigued; let her be seated, and I will, in a few sentences, close my dreadful story.”

The squared block of wood, which lay on the grass grown pavement of the chapel, formed a bench on which I was very glad to seat myself, and in the meantime the General called to the woodman, who had been removing some boughs which leaned upon the old walls; and, axe in hand, the hardy old fellow stood before us.

He could not tell us anything of these monuments; but there was an old man, he said, a ranger of this forest, at present sojourning in the house of the priest, about two miles away, who could point out every monument of the old Karnstein family; and, for a trifle, he undertook to bring him back with him, if we would lend him one of our horses, in little more than half an hour.

“Have you been long employed about this forest?” asked my father of the old man.

“I have been a woodman here,” he answered in his patois,<sup>2</sup> “under the forester, all my days; so has my father before me, and so on, as many generations as I can count up. I could show you the very house, in the village here, in which my ancestors lived.”

“How came the village to be deserted?” asked the General.

“It was troubled by revenants,<sup>3</sup> Sir; several were tracked to their graves, there detected by the usual tests, and extinguished in the usual way, by decapitation, by the stake, and by burning; but not until many of the villagers were killed.

“But after all these proceedings according to law,” he continued—“so many graves opened, and so many vampires deprived of their horrible animation—the village was not relieved. But a Moravian<sup>4</sup>

1. A regional dialect.

2. People who return from the dead; ghosts.

3. Moravia is a region in the current-day Czech Republic that borders Slovakia and Austria.

nobleman, who happened to be travelling this way, heard how matters were, and being skilled—as many people are in his country—in such affairs, he offered to deliver the village from its tormentor. He did so thus: There being a bright moon that night, he ascended, shortly after sunset, the towers of the chapel here, from whence he could distinctly see the churchyard beneath him; you can see it from that window. From this point he watched until he saw the vampire come out of his grave, and place near it the linen clothes in which he had been folded, and then glide away towards the village to plague its inhabitants.

“The stranger, having seen all this, came down from the steeple, took the linen wrappings of the vampire, and carried them up to the top of the tower, which he again mounted. When the vampire returned from his prowlings and missed his clothes, he cried furiously to the Moravian, whom he saw at the summit of the tower, and who, in reply, beckoned him to ascend and take them. Whereupon the vampire, accepting his invitation, began to climb the steeple, and so soon as he had reached the battlements, the Moravian, with a stroke of his sword, clove his skull in twain, hurling him down to the churchyard, whither, descending by the winding stairs, the stranger followed and cut his head off, and next day delivered it and the body to the villagers, who duly impaled and burnt them.

“This Moravian nobleman had authority from the then head of the family to remove the tomb of Mircalla, Countess Karnstein, which he did effectually, so that in a little while its site was quite forgotten.”

“Can you point out where it stood?” asked the General, eagerly.

The forester shook his head and smiled.

“Not a soul living could tell you that now,” he said; “besides, they say her body was removed; but no one is sure of that either.”

Having thus spoken, as time pressed, he dropped his axe and departed, leaving us to hear the remainder of the General’s strange story.

XIV

The Meeting

“My beloved child,” he resumed, “was now growing rapidly worse. The physician who attended her had failed to produce the slightest impression upon her disease, for such I then supposed it to be. He saw my alarm, and suggested a consultation. I called in an abler physician, from Gratz. Several days elapsed before he arrived. He was a good and pious, as well as a learned man. Having seen my poor ward together, they withdrew to my library to confer and discuss. I, from the adjoining room, where I awaited their summons, heard these two gentlemen’s voices raised in something sharper than a strictly philosophical discussion. I knocked at the door and entered. I found the old physician from Gratz maintaining his theory. His rival was combatting it with undisguised ridicule, accompanied with bursts of laughter. This unseemly manifestation subsided and the altercation ended on my entrance.

“‘Sir,’ said my first physician, ‘my learned brother seems to think that you want a conjuror, and not a doctor.’

“‘Pardon me,’ said the old physician from Gratz, looking displeased, ‘I shall state my own view of the case in my own way another time. I grieve, Monsieur le General, that by my skill and science I can be of no use. Before I go I shall do myself the honour to suggest something to you.’

“He seemed thoughtful, and sat down at a table and began to write. Profoundly disappointed, I made my bow, and as I turned to go the other doctor pointed over his shoulder to his companion who was writing, and then, with a shrug, significantly touched his forehead.

“This consultation, then, left me precisely where I was. I walked out into the grounds, all but distracted. The doctor from Gratz, in ten or fifteen minutes, overtook me. He apologised for having followed me, but said that he could not conscientiously take his leave without a few words more. He told me that he could not be mistaken; no natural disease exhibited the same symptoms; and that death was already very near. There remained, however, a day, or possibly two, of life. If the fatal seizure were at once arrested, with great care and skill her strength might possibly return. But all hung now upon the confines of the irrevocable. One more assault might extinguish the last spark of vitality which is, every moment, ready to die.

“‘And what is the nature of the seizure you speak of?’ I entreated.

“‘I have stated all fully in this note, which I place in your hands upon the distinct condition that you send for the nearest clergyman, and open my letter in his presence, and on no account read it till he is with you; you would despise it else, and it is a matter of life and death. Should the priest fail you, then, indeed, you may read it.’

“He asked me, before taking his leave finally, whether I would wish to see a man curiously learned upon the very subject, which, after I had read his letter, would probably interest me above all others, and he urged me earnestly to invite him to visit him there; and so took his leave.

“The ecclesiastic was absent, and I read the letter by myself. At another time, or in another case, it might have excited my ridicule. But into what quackeries will not people rush for a last chance, where all accustomed means have failed, and the life of a beloved object is at stake?

“Nothing, you will say, could be more absurd than the learned man’s letter. It was monstrous enough to have consigned him to a madhouse. He said that the patient was suffering from the visits of a vampire! The punctures which she described as having occurred near the throat, were, he insisted, the insertion of those two long, thin, and sharp teeth which, it is well known, are peculiar to vampires; and there could be no doubt, he added, as to the well-defined presence of the small livid mark which all concurred in describing as that induced by the demon’s lips, and every symptom described by the sufferer was in exact conformity with those recorded in every case of a similar visitation.

3. Engraving of “Carmilla,” drawn by D. H. Friston, engraved by C. M. Jenkin. From The Dark Blue, Mar. 1872. Courtesy of the Special Collections/Research Center, Syracuse University Library.

“Being myself wholly sceptical as to the existence of any such portent as the vampire, the supernatural theory of the good doctor furnished, in my opinion, but another instance of learning and intelligence oddly associated with some one hallucination. I was so miserable, however, that, rather than try nothing, I acted upon the instructions of the letter.

“I concealed myself in the dark dressing-room, that opened upon the poor patient’s room, in which a candle was burning, and watched there till she was fast asleep. I stood at the door, peeping through the small crevice, my sword laid on the table beside me, as my directions prescribed, until, a little after one, I saw a large black object, very ill-defined, crawl, as it seemed to me, over the foot of the bed, and swiftly spread itself up to the poor girl's throat, where it swelled, in a moment, into a great, palpitating mass. For a few moments I had stood petrified. I now sprang forward, with my sword in my hand. The black creature suddenly contracted toward the foot of the bed, glided over it, and, standing on the floor about a yard below the foot of the bed, with a glare of skulking ferocity and horror fixed on me, I saw Millarca. Speculating I know not what, I struck at her instantly with my sword; but I saw her standing near the door, unscathed. Horrified, I pursued, and struck again. She was gone; and my sword flew to shivers against the door.

"I can't describe to you all that passed on that horrible night. The whole house was up and stirring. The spectre Millarca was gone. But her victim was sinking fast, and before the morning dawned, she died."

The old General was agitated. We did not speak to him. My father walked to some little distance, and began reading the inscriptions on the tombstones; and thus occupied, he strolled into the door of a side-chapel to prosecute his researches. The General leaned against the wall, dried his eyes, and sighed heavily. I was relieved on hearing the voices of Carmilla and Madame, who were at that moment approaching. The voices died away.

In this solitude, having just listened to so strange a story, connected, as it was, with the great and titled dead, whose monuments were mouldering among the dust and ivy round us, and every incident of which bore so awfully upon my own mysterious case—in this haunted spot, darkened by the towering foliage that rose on every side, dense and high above its noiseless walls—a horror began to steal over me, and my heart sank as I thought that my friends were, after all, not about to enter and disturb this triste<sup>1</sup> and ominous scene.

The old General's eyes were fixed on the ground, as he leaned with his hand upon the basement of a shattered monument.

1. Sad.

Under a narrow, arched doorway, surmounted by one of those demoniacal grotesques in which the cynical and ghastly fancy of old Gothic carving delights, I saw very gladly the beautiful face and figure of Carmilla enter the shadowy chapel.

I was just about to rise and speak, and nodded smiling, in answer to her peculiarly engaging smile; when with a cry, the old man by my side caught up the woodman's hatchet, and started forward. On seeing him a brutalised change came over her features. It was an instantaneous and horrible transformation, as she made a crouching step backwards. Before I could utter a scream, he struck at her with all his force, but she dived under his blow, and unscathed, caught him in her tiny grasp by the wrist. He struggled for a moment to release his arm, but his hand opened, the axe fell to the ground, and the girl was gone.

He staggered against the wall. His grey hair stood upon his head, and a moisture shone over his face, as if he were at the point of death.

The frightful scene had passed in a moment. The first thing I recollect after, is Madame standing before me, and impatiently repeating again and again, the question, "Where is Mademoiselle Carmilla?"

I answered at length, "I don't know—I can't tell—she went there," and I pointed to the door through which Madame had just entered; "only a minute or two since."

"But I have been standing there, in the passage, ever since Mademoiselle Carmilla entered; and she did not return."

She then began to call "Carmilla," through every door and passage and from the windows, but no answer came.

"She called herself Carmilla?" asked the General, still agitated.

"Carmilla, yes," I answered.

"Aye," he said; "that is Millarca. That is the same person who long ago was called Mircalla, Countess Karnstein. Depart from this accursed ground, my poor child, as quickly as you can. Drive to the clergyman's house, and stay there till we come. Begone! May you never behold Carmilla more; you will not find her here."

XV

Ordeal and Execution

As he spoke one of the strangest looking men I ever beheld, entered the chapel at the door through which Carmilla had made her entrance and her exit. He was tall, narrow-chested, stooping, with high shoulders, and dressed in black. His face was brown and dried in with deep furrows; he wore an oddly-shaped hat with a broad leaf. His hair, long and grizzled, hung on his shoulders. He wore a pair of gold spectacles, and walked slowly, with an odd shambling gait, with his face sometimes turned up to the sky, and sometimes bowed down toward the ground, seemed to wear a perpetual smile; his long thin arms were swinging, and his lank hands, in old black gloves ever so much too wide for them, waving and gesticulating in utter abstraction.

“The very man!” exclaimed the General, advancing with manifest delight. “My dear Baron, how happy I am to see you, I had no hope of meeting you so soon.” He signed to my father, who had by this time returned, and leading the fantastic old gentleman, whom he called the Baron to meet him. He introduced him formally, and they at once entered into earnest conversation. The stranger took a roll of paper from his pocket, and spread it on the worn surface of a tomb that stood by. He had a pencil-case in his fingers, with which he traced imaginary lines from point to point on the paper, which from their often glancing from it, together, at certain points of the building, I concluded to be a plan of the chapel. He accompanied, what I may term, his lecture, with occasional readings from a dirty little book, whose yellow leaves were closely written over.

They sauntered together down the side aisle, opposite to the spot where I was standing, conversing as they went; then they begun<sup>1</sup> measuring distances by paces, and finally they all stood together, facing a piece of the side-wall, which they began to examine with great minuteness; pulling off the ivy that clung over it, and rapping the plaster with the ends of their sticks, scraping here, and knocking there. At length they ascertained the existence of a broad marble tablet, with letters carved in relief upon it.

With the assistance of the woodman, who returned, a monumental inscription, and carved escutcheon, were disclosed. They proved to be those of the long lost monument of Mircalla, Countess Karnstein.

The old General, though not I fear given to the praying mood, raised his hands and eyes to heaven, in mute thanksgiving for some moments.

“To-morrow,” I heard him say; “the commissioner will be here, and the Inquisition will be held according to law.”

Then turning to the old man with the gold spectacles, whom I have described, he shook him warmly by both hands and said:

“Baron, how can I thank you? How can we all thank you? You will have delivered this region from a plague that has scourged its inhabitants for more than a century. The horrible enemy, thank God, is at last tracked.”

My father led the stranger aside, and the General followed. I knew that he had led them out of hearing, that he might relate my case, and I saw them glance often quickly at me, as the discussion proceeded.

My father came to me, kissed me again and again, and leading me from the chapel, said:

“It is time to return, but before we go home, we must add to our party the good priest, who lives but a little way from this; and persuade him to accompany us to the schloss.”

In this quest we were successful: and I was glad, being unspeakably fatigued when we reached home. But my satisfaction was changed to dismay, on discovering that there were no tidings of Carmilla. Of the scene that had occurred in the ruined chapel, no explanation was offered to me, and it was clear that it was a secret which my father for the present determined to keep from me.

1. An erroneous usage of the verb instead of “began.”

The sinister absence of Carmilla made the remembrance of the scene more horrible to me. The arrangements for that night were singular. Two servants, and Madame were to sit up in my room that night; and the ecclesiastic with my father kept watch in the adjoining dressing-room.

The priest had performed certain solemn rites that night, the purport of which I did not understand any more than I comprehended the reason of this extraordinary precaution taken for my safety during sleep.

I saw all clearly a few days later.

The disappearance of Carmilla was followed by the discontinuance of my nightly sufferings.

You have heard, no doubt, of the appalling superstition that prevails in Upper and Lower Styria,<sup>2</sup> in Moravia, Silisia, in Turkish Servia, in Poland, even in Russia; the superstition, so we must call it, of the Vampire.

If human testimony, taken with every care and solemnity, judicially, before commissions innumerable, each consisting of many members, all chosen for integrity and intelligence, and constituting reports more voluminous perhaps than exist upon any one other class of cases, is worth anything, it is difficult to deny, or even to doubt the existence of such a phenomenon as the Vampire.

For my part I heard no theory by which to explain what I myself have witnessed and experienced, other than that supplied by the ancient and well-attested belief of the country.

The next day the formal proceedings took place in the Chapel of Karnstein. The grave of the Countess Mircalla was opened; and the

2. "Upper" and "Lower" capitalized as part of proper regional names in In a Glass Darkly.

General and my father recognised each his perfidious and beautiful guest, in the face now disclosed to view. The features, though a hundred and fifty years had passed since her funeral, were tinted with the warmth of life. Her eyes were open; no cadaverous smell exhaled from the coffin. The two medical men, one officially present, the other on the part of the promoter of the enquiry, attested the marvellous fact, that there was a faint but appreciable respiration, and a corresponding action of the heart. The limbs were perfectly flexible, the flesh elastic; and the leaden coffin floated with blood, in which to a depth of seven inches, the body lay immersed. Here then, were all the admitted signs and proofs of vampirism. The body, therefore, in accordance with the ancient practice, was raised, and a sharp stake driven through the heart of the vampire, who uttered a piercing shriek at the moment, in all respects such as might escape from a living person in the last agony. Then the head was struck off, and a torrent of blood flowed from the severed neck. The body and head were next placed on a pile of wood, and reduced to ashes, which were thrown upon the river and borne away, and that territory has never since been plagued by the visits of a vampire.

My father has a copy of the report of the Imperial Commission, with the signatures of all who were present at these proceedings, attached in verification of the statement. It is from this official paper that I have summarized my account of this last shocking scene.

XVI

Conclusion

I write all this you suppose with composure. But far from it; I cannot think of it without agitation. Nothing but your earnest desire so repeatedly expressed, could have induced me to sit down to a task that has unstrung my nerves for months to come, and reinduced a shadow of the unspeakable horror which years after my deliverance continued to make my days and nights dreadful, and solitude insupportably terrific.

Let me add a word of two about that quaint Baron Vordenburg, to whose curious lore we were indebted for the discovery of the Countess Mircalla's grave.

He had taken up his abode in Gratz, where, living upon a mere pittance, which was all that remained to him of the once princely estates of his family, in Upper Styria, he devoted himself to the minute and laborious investigation of the marvellously authenticated tradition of Vampirism. He had at his fingers<sup>1</sup> ends all the great and little works upon the subject. "Magia Posthuma," "Phlegon de Mirabilibus," "Augustinus de curâ pro Mortuis," "Philosophicae et Christianae Cogitationes de Vampiris," by John Christofer Herenberg;<sup>2</sup> and a thousand others, among which I remember only a few of those which he lent to my father. He had a voluminous digest of all the judicial

1. Changed from singular possessive to plural possessive in In a Glass Darkly.

2. Apparently fictional titles created by Le Fanu to give the ring of scientific validity to Baron Vordenburg's research and knowledge.

cases, from which he had extracted a system of principles that appear to govern—some always, and others occasionally only—the condition of the vampire. I may mention, in passing, that the deadly pallor attributed to that sort of revenants, is a mere melodramatic fiction. They present, in the grave, and when they show themselves in human society, the appearance of healthy life. When disclosed to light in their coffins, they exhibit all the symptoms that are enumerated as those which proved the vampire-life of the long-dead Countess Karnstein. How they escape from their graves and return to them for certain hours every day, without displacing the clay or leaving any trace of disturbance in the state of the coffin or the cerements, has always been admitted to be utterly inexplicable. The amphibious existence of the vampire is sustained by daily renewed slumber in the grave. Its horrible lust for living blood supplies the vigour of its waking existence. The vampire is prone to be fascinated with an engrossing vehemence, resembling the passion of love, by particular persons. In pursuit of these it will exercise inexhaustible patience and stratagem, for access to a particular object may be obstructed in a hundred ways. It will never desist until it has satiated its passion, and drained the very life of its coveted victim. But it will, in these cases, husband and protract its murderous enjoyment with the refinement of an epicure, and heighten it by the gradual approaches of an artful courtship. In these cases it seems to yearn for something like sympathy and consent. In ordinary ones it goes direct to its object, overpowers with violence, and strangles and exhausts often at a single feast.

The vampire is, apparently, subject, in certain situations, to special conditions. In the particular instance of which I have given you a relation, Mircalla seemed to be limited to a name which, if not her real one, should at least reproduce, without the omission or addition of a single letter, those, as we say, anagrammatically, which compose it. Carmilla did this; so did Millarca.

My father related to the Baron Vordenburg, who remained with us for two or three weeks after the expulsion of Carmilla, the story about the Moravian nobleman and the vampire at Karnstein churchyard, and then he asked the Baron how he had discovered the exact position of the long-concealed tomb of the Countess Millarca? The Baron's grotesque features puckered up into a mysterious smile; he looked down, still smiling on his worn spectacle-case, and fumbled with it. Then looking up, he said:

"I have many journals, and other papers, written by that remarkable man; the most curious among them is one treating of the visit of which you speak, to Karnstein. The tradition, of course, discolours and distorts a little. He might have been termed a Moravian nobleman, for he had changed his abode to that territory, and was, beside, a noble. But he was, in truth, a native of Upper Styria. It is enough to say that in very early youth he had been a passionate and favoured lover of the beautiful Mircalla, Countess Karnstein. Her early death plunged him into inconsolable grief. It is the nature of vampires to increase and multiply, but according to an ascertained and ghostly law.

"Assume, at starting, a territory perfectly free from that pest. How does it begin, and how does it multiply itself? I will tell you. A person, more or less wicked, puts an end to himself. A suicide, under certain circumstances, becomes a vampire. That spectre visits living people in their slumbers; they die, and almost invariably, in the grave, develope<sup>3</sup> into vampires. This happened in the case of the beautiful Mircalla, who was haunted by one of those demons. My ancestor, Vordenburg, whose title I still bear, soon discovered this, and in the course of the studies to which he devoted himself, learned a great deal more.

"Among other things, he concluded that suspicion of vampirism would probably fall, sooner or later, upon the dead Countess, who in life had been his idol. He conceived a horror, be she what she might, of her remains being profaned by the outrage of a posthumous execution. He has left a curious paper to prove that the vampire, on its expulsion from its amphibious existence, is projected into a far more horrible life; and he resolved to save his once beloved Mircalla from this. He adopted the stratagem of a journey here, a pretended removal of her remains, and a real obliteration of her monument. When age had stolen upon him, and from the vale of years he looked back on the scenes he was leaving, he considered, in a different spirit, what he had done, and a horror took possession of him. He made the tracings and notes which have guided me to the very spot, and drew up a confession of the deception that he had practised. If he had intended any further action in this matter, death prevented him; and the hand of a remote descendant has, too late for many, directed the pursuit to the lair of the beast.”

3. An older, alternate spelling for "develop" (see OED).

We talked a little more, and among other things he said was this:

“One sign of the vampire is the power of the hand. The slender hand of Mircalla closed like a vice of steel on the General’s wrist when he raised the hatchet to strike. But its power is not confined to its grasp; it leaves a numbness in the limb it seizes, which is slowly, if ever, recovered from.”

The following spring my father took me a tour<sup>4</sup> through Italy. We remained away for more than a year. It was long before the terror of recent events subsided; and to this hour the image of Carmilla returns to memory with ambiguous alternations—sometimes the playful, languid, beautiful girl; sometimes the writhing fiend I saw in the ruined church; and often from a reverie I have started, fancying I heard the light step of Carmilla at the drawing-room door.

4. This construction, which today would be “on a tour,” is maintained in both the serialized and the later anthologized versions of the text.

Timeline

Date	Ireland	North America	World
1862	Harland & Wolff Shipyards formed in Belfast	H. W. Longfellow, Tales of a Wayside Inn	Ivan Turgenev, Fathers and Sons ; Victor Hugo, Les Misérables
1863	National paper The Irish People founded	Emancipation Proclamation frees slaves in the United States.	Edouard Manet, Déjeuner sur l'herbe scandalizes Paris.
1864	J. Sheridan Le Fanu, Uncle Silas . Irish National Gallery opens in Dublin.	Stephen Foster, “Beautiful Dreamer”	Charles Dickens, Our Mutual Friend
1865	William Butler Yeats born.	End of US Civil War; Abraham Lincoln assassinated	Lewis Carroll, Alice in Wonderland
1866	Alexandra College, Dublin, offers education to young women.	Completion of trans-Atlantic telegraph cable from Newfoundland to Ireland	Fyodor Dostoevsky, Crime and Punishment
1867	Violent Fenian uprisings throughout Ireland	Canada, Articles of Confederation	Karl Marx, Das Kapital
1868	Irish Reform Act increases voting franchise.	Louisa May Alcott, Little Women	Willkie Collins, The Moonstone

Date	Ireland	North America	World
1869	Irish Church Act disestablishes Church of Ireland.	US transcontinental railway completed with “Golden Spike” in Utah	Leo Tolstoy, War and Peace
1870	Isaac Butt founds Home Rule movement.		Death of Charles Dickens; The Mystery of Edwin Drood
1871	John Millington Synge born	Great Chicago Fire	Charles Darwin, The Descent of Man
1872	First horse-drawn tramcars run in Dublin.	Brooklyn Bridge opens.	George Elliot, Middlemarch ; Jules Verne, Around the World in Eighty Days
1873	Eugene O’Curry, On the Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish , 3 vols.	American football clubs adopt uniform rules.	Germans evacuate France after triumph in the Franco-Prussian War.
1874	Irish Football (Rugby) Association formed in Dublin	First American zoo opens in Philadelphia.	First expressionist exhibit in Paris
1875	Farming tenants’ rights conference in Dublin	Mark Twain, Adventures of Tom Sawyer	Georges Bizet, Carmen
1876	Six Fenian convicts make daring escape in western Australia aboard Catalpa .	General G. A. Custer’s “last stand”	Richard Wagner completes Ring Cycle .
1877	Charles Stewart Parnell becomes president of Home Rule Confederation.	Thomas Edison develops the phonograph.	Sir John Rhys appointed first professor of Celtic languages, Oxford
1878		Henry James, Daisy Miller	Thomas Hardy, Return of the Native
1879	Land Leagues founded	Henry George, Progress and Poverty	Henryk Ibsen, The Doll’s House

Date	Ireland	North America	World
1880	Laborers refuse to work for Captain Charles Boycott of County Mayo.	New York streets first lighted by electricity	Fyodor Dostoevsky, The Brothers Karamazov
1881	Royal University of Ireland Act opens higher education to Catholics.	William H. Bonney, "Billy the Kid," murdered	Flogging abolished in British army and navy
1882	James Joyce born	Oscar Wilde tours America.	Hiram S. Maxim patents recoil-operated machine gun.

Works Cited and Additional Materials

Works Cited

- Andriano, Joseph. 1990. "'Our Dual Existence': Archetypes of Love and Death in Le Fanu's 'Carmilla.'" In Contours of the Fantastic: Selected Essays from the Eighth International Conference on the Fantastic in the Arts, 49–55. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Auerbach, Nina. 1995. Our Vampires, Ourselves. Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press.
- Backus, Margo Gayle. 1999. The Gothic Family Romance: Heterosexuality, Child Sacrifice, and the Anglo-Irish Colonial Order. Durham, NC: Duke Univ. Press.
- Bourdieu, Pierre. 1987. Distinction: A Social Critique of the Judgment of Taste. Translated by Richard Nice. Cambridge, MA: Harvard Univ. Press.
- Brock, Marilyn. 2009. "The Vamp and the Good English Mother: Female Roles in Le Fanu's Carmilla and Stoker's Dracula." In From Wollstonecraft to Stoker: Essays on Gothic and Victorian Sensation Fiction, edited by Marilyn Brock, 120–31. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- Brown, Terence. 1991. "Cultural Nationalism 1880–1930." In Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing, 2:516–20. Derry: Field Day.
- Bull, Philip. 1996. Land, Politics, and Nationalism: A Study of the Irish Land Question. Dublin: Gill and Macmillan.
- Burke, Edmund. [1757] 1996. "A Philosophical Treatise into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful." In British Literature 1780–1830, edited by Anne K. Mellor and Richard E. Matlak, 134–37. Fort Worth, TX: Harcourt Brace College.

- Cahir Costanzo, Linda. 2006. Literature into Film: Theory and Practical Approaches. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- Canny, Nicholas. 1987. "Identity Formation in Ireland: The Emergence of the Anglo-Irish." In Colonial Identity in the Atlantic World, 1500–1800, edited by Nicholas Canny and Anthony Pagden, 159–212. Princeton, NJ: Princeton Univ. Press.
- Cardwell, Sarah. 2007. "Literature on the Small Screen: Television Adaptations." In The Cambridge Companion to Literature on Screen, edited by Deborah Cartmell and Imelda Whelehan, 181–97. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge Univ. Press.
- Cixous, Hélène, and Catherine Clement. 1986. The Newly Born Woman. Translated by Betsy Wing. Introduction by Sandra M. Gilbert. Minneapolis: Univ. of Minnesota Press.
- Clery, E. J., and Robert Miles, eds. 2000. Gothic Documents: A Sourcebook, 1700–1820. Manchester, UK: Manchester Univ. Press.
- Davis, Michael. 2004. "Gothic's Enigmatic Signifier: The Case of J. Sheridan Le Fanu's 'Carmilla.'" Gothic Studies 6, no. 2: 223–35.
- Deane, Seamus. 1997. Strange Country: Modernity and Nationhood in Irish Writing since 1790. London: Clarendon Press.
- Dunne, Tom. 1989. "Haunted by History: Irish Romantic Writing 1800–1850." In Romanticism in a National Context, edited by Roy Porter and Miklaus Teich, 68–91. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge Univ. Press.
- Dyer, Richard. 1988. "Children of the Night: Vampirism as Homosexuality, Homosexuality as Vampirism." In Sweet Dreams: Sexuality, Gender, and Popular Fiction, edited by Susannah Radstone, 47–73. London: Lawrence and Wishart.
- Eagleton, Terry. 1995. Heathcliff and the Great Hunger: Studies in Irish Culture. London: Verso.
- Eco, Umberto. 1990. "Casablanca: Cult Movies and Intertextual Collage." In Travels in Hyper Reality: Essays, 197–212. Reprint. New York: Mariner Books.
- Fegan, Melissa. 2002. Literature and the Irish Famine, 1845–1919. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Foster, Roy. 1995. Paddy and Mr. Punch: Connections in Irish and English History. London: Penguin.
- Gabusi, Valentina. 2008. "The Mirroring Frame: Narrative Device and Reflected Victorianism in In a Glass Darkly." Le Fanu Studies 3, no. 2:

- 1–8. At <http://www.lefanustudies.com/mirroring.html>. Accessed July 8, 2011.
- Geary, Robert. 1999. “‘Carmilla’ and the Gothic Legacy: Victorian Transformations of Supernatural Horror.” In The Blood Is the Life: Vampires in Literature, edited by Leonard G. Heldreth and Mary Pharr, 19–29. Bowling Green, OH: Bowling Green State Univ. Popular Press.
- Gelder, Ken. 1994. Reading the Vampire. New York: Routledge.
- Gibbons, Luke. 2004. Gaelic Gothic: Race, Colonization, and Irish Culture. Dublin: Arlen House.
- . 2006. Gaelic Gothic: Race, Colonization, and Irish Culture. Dublin: Arlen House.
- Gibson, Matthew. 2006. Dracula and the Eastern Question: British and French Vampire Narratives of the Nineteenth-Century Near East. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.
- . 2007. “Jane Cranstoun, Countess Purgstall: A Possible Inspiration for Le Fanu’s ‘Carmilla.’” Le Fanu Studies 2, no. 2. At <http://www.lefanustudies.com/cranstoun.html>. Accessed July 8, 2011.
- Gilpin, William. 1808. Three Essays: “On Picturesque Beauty”; “On Picturesque Travel”; and “On Sketching Landscape: With a Poem on Landscape Painting.” 3rd ed. London: T. Cadell and W. Davies.
- Glover, David. 1996. Vampires, Mummies, and Liberals: Bram Stoker and the Politics of Popular Fiction. Durham, NC: Duke Univ. Press.
- Hansen, Jim. 2009. Terror and Irish Modernism: The Gothic Tradition from Burke to Beckett. New York: State Univ. of New York Press.
- Harris, Sally. 2003. “Spiritual Warnings: The Ghost Stories of Sheridan Le Fanu.” Victorians Institute Journal 31: 9–39.
- Haslam, Richard. 1998. “Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu and the Fantastic Semantics of Ghost-Colonial Ireland.” In That Other World: The Supernatural and the Fantastic in Irish Literature and Its Contexts, vol. 1, edited by Bruce Stewart, 268–86. Gerrards Cross, Ireland: Colin Smythe.
- . 2007a. “Irish Gothic.” In The Routledge Companion to Gothic, edited by Catherine Spooner and Emma McEvoy, 83–94. London: Routledge.
- . 2007b. “Irish Gothic: A Rhetorical Hermeneutics Approach.” Irish Journal of Gothic and Horror Studies 2. At <http://irishgothichorrorjournal.homestead.com/IrishGothicHaslam.html>. Accessed Mar. 31, 2011.
- Heller, Tamar. 1996. “The Vampire in the House: Hysteria, Female Sexuality, and Female Knowledge in Le Fanu’s ‘Carmilla’ (1872).” In The New

- Nineteenth Century: Feminist Readings of Underread Victorian Fiction*, edited by Barbara Leah Harman and Susan Meyer, 77–95. New York: Garland.
- Howes, Marjorie. 1992. "Misalliance and Anglo-Irish Tradition in Le Fanu's Uncle Silas." Nineteenth-Century Literature 47, no. 2: 164–86.
- Hughes, William. 2005. "The Origins and Implications of J. S. Le Fanu's 'Green Tea.'" Irish Studies Review 13, no. 1: 45–54.
- Hutcheon, Linda. 2006. A Theory of Adaptation. New York: Routledge.
- Jackson, Alvin. 1999. Ireland: 1798–1998. Malden, MA: Blackwell.
- Kelleher, Margaret. 1997. The Feminization of Famine: Expressions of the Inexpressible? Cork, Ireland: Cork Univ. Press.
- Kilgour, Maggie. 1995. The Rise of the Gothic Novel. London: Routledge.
- Killeen, Jarlath. 2006. "Irish Gothic: A Theoretical Introduction." Irish Journal of Gothic and Horror Studies 1. At <http://irishgothichorrorjournal.homestead.com/index.html>. Accessed Mar. 31, 2011.
- Leal, Amy. 2007. "Unnameable Desires in Le Fanu's Carmilla." Names 55, no. 1: 37–52.
- Lee, Hyun-Jung. 2006. "'One for Ever': Desire, Subjectivity, and the Threat of the Object in Carmilla." In Vampires: Myths and Metaphors of Enduring Evil, edited by Peter Day, 21–38. Amsterdam: Rodopi.
- Leitch, Thomas. 2008. Film Adaptation and Its Discontents: From "Gone with the Wind" to "The Passion of the Christ". Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Univ. Press.
- Lyons, F. S. L. 1965. Ireland since the Famine. London: Fontana Press.
- Madoff, Mark. 1979. "The Useful Myth of Gothic Ancestry." Studies in Eighteenth-Century Culture 8: 337–50.
- Major, Adrienne Antrim. 2007. "Other Love: Le Fanu's Carmilla as Lesbian Gothic." In Horri-fying Sex: Essays on Sexual Difference in Gothic Literature, edited by Ruth Binstock Anolik, 151–66. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- Mangum, Teresa. 1997. "Sheridan Le Fanu's Ungovernable Governesses." Studies in the Novel 29, no. 2: 214–37.
- Marcus, Sharon. 2005. "Reflections on Victorian Fashion Plates." Differences 14, no. 3: 4–33.
- . 2007. Between Women: Friendship, Desire, and Marriage in Victorian England. Princeton, NJ: Princeton Univ. Press.
- McAteer, Michael. 2010. "A Troubled Union: Representations of Eastern Europe in Nineteenth-Century Irish Protestant Literature." In Facing

- the East in the West: Images of Eastern Europe in British Literature, Film, and Culture*, edited by Barbara Korte, Eva Ulrike Pirker, and Sissy Helff, 205–18. Amsterdam: Rodopi.
- McCormack, W. J. 1980. Sheridan Le Fanu and Victorian Ireland. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press.
- . 1991. “Joseph Sheridan le Fanu (1814–1873).” In Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing, edited by Seamus Deane, 2:883. Derry: Field Day.
- . 1993. Dissolute Characters: Irish Literary History Through Balzac, Sheridan Le Fanu, Yeats, and Bowen. Manchester, UK: Manchester Univ. Press.
- . 1997. Sheridan Le Fanu. Gloucestershire, UK: Sutton.
- McNally, Raymond T. 2001. “In Search of the Lesbian Vampire: Barbara von Cilli, Le Fanu’s ‘Carmilla,’ and the Dragon Order.” Journal of Dracula Studies 3: 8–14.
- Michelis, Angelica. 2003. “‘Dirty Mamma’: Horror, Vampires, and the Maternal in Late Nineteenth-Century Gothic Fiction.” Critical Survey 15, no. 3: 5–22.
- Miller, Elizabeth. 2006. “Getting to Know the Un-dead: Bram Stoker, Vampires, and Dracula.” In Vampires: Myths and Metaphors of Enduring Evil, edited by Peter Day, 3–19. Amsterdam: Rodopi.
- Mishra, Vijay. 1994. The Gothic Sublime. New York: State Univ. of New York Press.
- Moynahan, Julian. 1994. “The Politics of Anglo-Irish Gothic: Charles Robert Maturin, Sheridan Le Fanu, and the Return of the Repressed.” In Anglo-Irish: The Literary Imagination of a Hyphenated Culture, 109–35. Princeton, NJ: Princeton Univ. Press.
- Punter, David. 1996. The Literature of Terror: A History of Gothic Fictions from 1765 to the Present Day. 2 vols. London: Longman.
- Ridenhour, Jamieson. 2002. “A Terrible Beauty: ‘Carmilla’ as Aisling.” Cleave: A Journal of Literary Criticism 1, no. 2: 56–63.
- Sage, Victor. 1988. Horror Fiction in the Protestant Tradition. Houndsmills, UK: Macmillan.
- . 2004. Le Fanu’s Gothic: The Rhetoric of Darkness. London: Palgrave.
- Saler, Benson, and Charles A. Ziegler. 2005. “Dracula and Carmilla: Monsters and the Mind.” Philosophy and Literature 29: 218–27.
- Senf, Carol A. 1987. “Women and Power in ‘Carmilla.’” Gothic 2: 25–33.

- Signorotti, Elizabeth. 1996. "Repossessing the Body: Transgressive Desire in 'Carmilla' and Dracula." Criticism 38, no. 4: 607–32.
- Smyth, Jim. 1993. "'Like Amphibious Animals': Irish Protestants, Ancient Britons, 1691–1707." Historical Journal 36, no. 4: 785–97.
- Sontag, Susan. 2001. "Notes on Camp." In Against Interpretation and Other Writings, 275–93. New York: Picador.
- Thomas, Tammis Elise. 1999. "Masquerade Liberties and Female Power in Le Fanu's Carmilla." In The Haunted Mind: The Supernatural in Victorian Literature, edited by Elton Edward Smith and Robert Haas, 39–65. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press.
- Todorov, Tzvetan. 1973. The Fantastic: A Structural Approach to a Literary Genre. Translated by Richard Howard. London: Case Western Reserve Univ.
- Tracy, Robert. 1993. "Introduction." In In a Glass Darkly, by J. Sheridan Le Fanu, vii–xxviii. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press.
- . 1998. "Sheridan Le Fanu and the Unmentionable." In The Unappeasable Host: Studies in Irish Identity, 57–72. Dublin: Univ. College of Dublin Press.
- . 1999. "Undead, Unburied: Anglo-Ireland and the Predatory Past." LIT 10: 13–33.
- Twitchell, James B. 1988. "Dreadful Pleasures": An Anatomy of Modern Horror. New York: Oxford Univ. Press.
- Valente, Joseph. 2002. Dracula's Crypt: Bram Stoker, Irishness, and the Question of Blood. Urbana: Univ. of Illinois Press.
- Veeder, William. 1980. "Carmilla: The Arts of Repression." Texas Studies in Language and Literature 22, no. 2: 197–223.
- Welter, Nancy. 2006. "Women Alone: Le Fanu's 'Carmilla' and Rossetti's 'Goblin Market.'" In Victorian Sensations: Essays on a Scandalous Genre, edited by Kimberly Harrison and Richard Fantina, 138–48. Columbus: Ohio State Univ. Press.
- Whelan, Kevin. 1996. The Tree of Liberty: Radicalism, Catholicism, and the Construction of Irish Identity, 1760–1830. Cork, Ireland: Cork Univ. Press, in association with Field Day.
- Whelehan, Imelda. 1999. "Adaptations: The Contemporary Dilemmas." In Adaptations: From Text to Screen, Screen to Text, edited by Deborah Cartmell and Imelda Whelehan, 3–19. New York: Routledge.

- Williams, Anne, ed. 2003. Three Vampire Tales: "Dracula" by Bram Stoker; "Carmilla" by Sheridan Le Fanu; "The Vampyre" by John Polidori. New Riverside Editions. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
- Willis, Martin. 2008. "Le Fanu's 'Carmilla,' Ireland, and Diseased Vision." In Essays and Studies 2008: Literature and Science, edited by Sharon Ruston, 111–30. Cambridge, UK: Boydell and Brewer.
- Zuber, Devin P. 2006. "Swedenborg and the Disintegration of Language in Sheridan Le Fanu's Sensation Fiction." In Victorian Sensations: Essays on a Scandalous Genre, edited by Kimberly Harrison and Richard Fantina, 74–84. Columbus: Ohio State Univ. Press.

Additional Materials

Books and Dissertations

- Elliott, Kamilla. 2003. Rethinking the Novel/Film Debate. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge Univ. Press.
- Le Fanu, William Richard. 1893. Seventy Years of Irish Life, Being Anecdotes and Reminiscences. New York: Macmillan.
- Walton, James. 2007. Vision and Vacancy: The Fictions of J. S. Le Fanu. Dublin: Univ. College Dublin Press.
- Zwickel, Marian Carol. 1996. "A Narratological Reading Emphasizing the Narrator/Narratee Relationships in Mary Shelley's 'Frankenstein,' Charles Robert Maturin's 'Melmoth the Wanderer,' and J. Sheridan Le Fanu's 'Carmilla.'" PhD diss., West Virginia Univ., 1995.

Articles and Reviews

- Acocella, Joan. 2009. "In the Blood: Why Do Vampires Still Thrill?" The New Yorker (Mar. 16): 101–7.
- Auerbach, Nina. 1997. "My Vampire, My Friend: The Intimate Dracula Destroyed." In Blood Read: The Vampire as Metaphor in Contemporary Culture, edited by Joan Gordon and Veronica Hollinger, 11–16. Philadelphia: Univ. of Pennsylvania Press.
- Case, Sue-Ellen. 1997. "Tracking the Vampire." In Writing on the Body: Female Embodiment and Feminist Theory, edited by Katie Conboy,

- Nadia Medina, and Sarah Stanbury, 380–400. New York: Columbia Univ. Press.
- Doniger, Wendy. 1995. "Sympathy for the Vampire." Review of Our Vampires, Ourselves by Nina Auerbach. The Nation (Nov. 20): 608–12.
- Feu Guaijarro, María José. 1997. "The Semantics of the Supernatural in Le Fanu's 'Carmilla': A Functional Lexematic Analysis of the Story of a Female Vampire." Proceedings of the 20th International AEDEAN Conference, edited by P. Guardia and J. Stone, 445–51. Barcelona: Universitat de Barcelona.
- Gal, Ana Gratiela. 2008. "Re-inventing Irishness in Sheridan Le Fanu's Carmilla." Journal of Dracula Studies 10: 19–25.
- Hennelly, Mark M. 2009. "'Through Every Door and Passage': A Liminal Reading of Carmilla." Le Fanu Studies 4, no. 2. At <http://www.lefanustudies.com/liminal.html>. Accessed July 8, 2011.
- Lapinski, Piya Pal. 1994. "Dickens's Miss Wade and J. S. Le Fanu's Carmilla: The Female Vampire in Little Dorrit." Dickens Quarterly 11, no. 2: 81–87.
- Maume, Patrick. 2009. "Le Fanu, Joseph Thomas Sheridan." In Dictionary of Irish Biography. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press; Dublin: Royal Irish Academy. At <http://0-dib.cambridge.org.library.lemoyne.edu/quicksearch.do;jsessionid=E9D0E809FD5A2AD9114599C6445AFD14>. Accessed July 8, 2011.
- Russell, Sharon. 1999. "The Influence of Dracula on the Lesbian Vampire Film." Journal of Dracula Studies 1: 28–32.
- Sceats, Sarah. 2001. "Oral Sex: Vampiric Transgression and the Writing of Angela Carter." Tulsa Studies in Women's Literature 20, no. 1: 107–21.

Films

- Alucarda*. 1978. Dir. Juan López Moctezuma.
- Blood and Roses*. 1960. Dir. Roger Vadim.
- The Blood Splattered Bride*. 1972. Dir. Vincente Aranda.
- Carmilla*. 1989. Dir. Gabrielle Beaumont.
- Carmilla*. Forthcoming. Dir. Paul Wiffen.
- Carmilla: The Lesbian Vampire*. 2004. Dir. Vince D'Amato.
- Let's Scare Jessica to Death*. 1971. Dir. John D. Hancock.
- Terror in the Crypt*. 1963. Dir. Camillo Mastrocinque.

Vampire Hunter D: Bloodlust. 2000. Dir. Yoshiaki Kawajiri.

The Vampire Lovers. 1970. Dir. Roy Ward Baker.

Vampyr. 1931. Dir. Carl Dreyer.

Vampyres. 1974. Dir. Jose Ramon Larraz.

Internet Resources

Journal of Le Fanu Studies. At <http://www.lefanustudies.com/index.html>.

J. Sheridan Le Fanu: A Database. At <http://www.lefanustudies.com/database.html>.

Biographical Notes

Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu (1814–1873)

Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu was born into a well-established Anglo-Irish family in Dublin on August 28, 1814: his lineage connects the Huguenot-descended Le Fanu family, the powerful literary Sheridan line, and the ecclesiastical and somewhat radical Dobbins family in an insular web. Le Fanu's father, Thomas, was a Church of Ireland reverend assigned in 1815 to the Hibernian Military School. Thomas's appointment to Abington and other, minor income-generating positions brought the family out of Dublin in 1826 but into the orbit of political tensions in 1820s Ireland. Nearby Limerick—rural, radical, and appallingly poor—highlighted the gap between an (even tolerantly engaged) absentee Anglo-Irish family and poor Irish Catholics at this time. Given that this familial move occurred as the Catholic Emancipation debate exploded and the Tithe War began, the senior Le Fanu's income was consistently in jeopardy, his rectorship plagued by the conjunction of his own aloofness and his parishioners' passive hostility. Le Fanu's childhood impressions were undoubtedly influenced by the political events, isolation, and turmoil that surrounded him in his youth.

Le Fanu was for a time ineffectively tutored by the Reverend John Stinson; he supplemented this inadequacy with reading from his father's library. He began formal studies at Trinity in 1832, although much of his scholarly work continued under his father's tutelage back in Abington. Expressing an interest in politics, Le Fanu joined the Historical Society at Trinity, which exposed him to less conservative views. He became president of the Historical Society and a barrister in 1839.

Le Fanu's writings first appeared in 1838 in the Dublin University Magazine, to which he gained access through his Historical Society associations, with stories that eventually would compose the Purcell Papers. He continued to provide short stories and contribute occasional articles to this publication, and he eventually made his livelihood largely through journalistic work, including with the Dublin University Magazine and as coeditor of the Dublin Evening Mail.

Le Fanu experienced financial struggles and personal losses from the 1840s on. His sister, Catherine, died in 1841. He married Susanna Bennett in 1844 and subsequently had four children, but his wife died in 1858, followed by his mother in 1861. Le Fanu's fiction writing had ebbed after 1848; each loss he suffered prompted a resurgence of writing, however. He released three novels in short order after 1863, beginning with The House by the Church-Yard, and published extensively between 1861 and 1873. These latter writings include arguably his best-known work, the short story collection In a Glass Darkly, which included Carmilla, and other generally less acclaimed work, such as The Wyvern Mystery. He died at Merrion Square in Dublin after a bout of bronchitis on February 7, 1873.

Sources for this biography and additional information on Le Fanu's life and its influence on his fiction include:

- "Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu (1814–1873)." 1991. In Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing, 2:883. Derry, Ireland: Field Day.
- Le Fanu, William Richard. 1893. Seventy Years of Irish Life, Being Anecdotes and Reminiscences. New York: Macmillan.
- Maume, Patrick. 2009. "Le Fanu, Joseph Thomas Sheridan." In Cambridge Dictionary of Irish Biography. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press; Dublin: Royal Irish Academy. Funded by the Higher Education Authority. At <http://0dib.cambridge.org.library.lemoyne.edu/quicksearch.do;jsessionid=E9D0E809FD5A2AD9114599C6445AFD14>. Accessed July 8, 2011.
- McCormack, W. J. 1980. Sheridan Le Fanu and Victorian Ireland. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Walton, James. 2007. Vision and Vacancy: The Fictions of J. S. Le Fanu. Dublin: Univ. College Dublin Press.

Contributors

Lisabeth C. Buchelt is an associate professor in the English Department at the University of Nebraska–Omaha, where she specializes in medieval British and Irish studies as well as nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century medievalism in both the visual arts and literature. She has published articles on the Anglo-Saxon representation of Eve in Old English literature, nineteenth- and twentieth-century Irish visual arts, narrative strategies in Bram Stoker's The Snake's Pass, and occultism in W. B. Yeats's later plays. She is currently working on a study of medieval Irish monastic reading practices.

Kathleen Costello-Sullivan is an associate professor of modern Irish literature at Le Moyne College in Syracuse, New York, where she also founded and directs the Irish literature minor program. She has published articles and book chapters on Emily Lawless, Rudyard Kipling, Maria Edgeworth, Molly Keane, and Colm Tóibín, among others. Her book Mother/Country: Politics of the Personal in the Fiction of Colm Tóibín was published in 2012. Her current book project is a study of trauma and narrative in contemporary Irish fiction.

Renée Fox is an assistant professor of English at the University of Miami. She earned her PhD from Princeton University and is currently working on a book manuscript entitled "Necromantic Victorians: Reanimation and Historical Aesthetics in British and Irish literature." She has published articles on Robert Browning and Michael Longley and has essays forthcoming on W. B. Yeats and Bram Stoker. She is also the coeditor of The Cracked Lookingglass: Highlights from the Leonard L. Milberg Collection of Irish Prose (2012), a collection of original essays by Paul Muldoon, Colm Tóibín, Michael Wood, and others.

Jarlath Killeen is a lecturer in Victorian literature at Trinity College Dublin; the author of The Faiths of Oscar Wilde (2005), Gothic Ireland (2005), The Fairy Tales of Oscar Wilde (2007), and British Gothic Literature, 1825–1914 (2009); and the editor of Oscar Wilde: Irish Writers in Their Time (2011).

Nancy M. West is a professor of English and the director of the Honors College and teaches Victorian and film studies at the University of Missouri–Columbia. She is the author of two books: Kodak and the Lens of Nostalgia

(2000), which offers the first cultural history of Kodak advertising, and Tabloid, Inc: Crimes, News, Narratives (2010), which looks at the rich exchange between New York's early tabloid newspapers and such narrative venues as hard-boiled fiction, Hollywood crime film, and museum exhibits. She has also written articles on such subjects as the serialization of Great Expectations in Harper's Weekly and the use of photography in early guidebooks to "Hardy country." She is currently working on a third book manuscript entitled "Masterpiece Theatre, Classic Novels, and the Pleasures of Adaptation."

"This welcome edition of Sheridan Le Fanu's classic gothic tale Carmilla frames the original serialized text with an admirable introduction and a series of brilliant essays that both return the vampire tale to its native historical earth and trace its flowering across varied national terrains, expressive genres and cultural traditions. Costello-Sullivan and her colleagues have given Le Fanu's vampire story a new un-death, in which its intellectual depth, political seriousness, complex eroticism and popular appeal are evident in all of their profound interconnectedness."

—JOSEPH VALENTE, author of The Myth of Manliness in Irish National Culture, 1880–1922

"Costello-Sullivan's exciting new edition of Le Fanu's Carmilla, the sly 1872 Anglo-Irish vampire tale that laid the groundwork for the arguably less subtle Dracula, productively returns to the text's original serialized publication format. . . . This book is suitable for both undergraduates and advanced scholars of gender, sexuality, and Irish and film studies alike."

—MARY BURKE, author of 'Tinkers': Synge and the Cultural History of the Irish Traveller

First serialized in the journal The Dark Blue and later published in the collection In a Glass Darkly, Le Fanu's 1872 vampire tale chronicles the experiences of a young woman lured by the charms of a female vampire. This edition includes a student-oriented introduction and four interdisciplinary essays that employ a variety of theoretical perspectives. Ranging from politics to gender, Gothicism to feminism, and nineteenth-century aestheticism to contemporary film studies, these critical yet accessible articles model the diverse ways in which scholars can approach a single text. With a glossary, biography, bibliography, and explanatory notes, this edition is ideal for students of Irish and British nineteenth-century literature.

KATHLEEN COSTELLO-SULLIVAN is associate professor of modern Irish literature and the director of the Irish Literature Program in the English Department at Le Moyne College in Syracuse, New York. She is the author of Mother / Country: Politics of the Personal in the Fiction of Colm Tóibín.

Irish Studies

Front: Photograph by David Arment. davidarmentphoto.com

SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY PRESS
SYRACUSE, NEW YORK 13244-5290

www.SyracuseUniversityPress.syr.edu

